POEMS TO ŚIVA

The Hymns of the Tamil Saints

Indira Viswanathan Peterson

Hope you enjoy it

THE KARNATIC MUSIC BOOK CENTRE

23A, Sripuram First Street, Royapettah, Chennai - 600 014. F: 28111716, 28113253 E-mail:kmbc@vsnl.net Website: www.camaticbooks.com

MOTILAL BANARSIDASS PUBLISHERS
PRIVATE LIMITED • DELHI

Reprint: Delhi, 2007 First Indian Edition: Delhi, 1991

© 1989 BY PRINCETON UNIVERSITY PRESS All rights reserved.

No part of this book may be reproduced or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopying, recording, or by any information storage and retrieval system, without permission in writing from the publishers.

ISBN: 978-81-208-0784-6

Acknowledgements

The quotations from An Anthology of Sanskrit Court Poetry: Vidyākara's Subhāṣitaratnakoṣa by D.H.H. Ingalls, Harvard Oriental Series, vol. 44 (Cambridge: Harvard University Press; © 1965 by the President and fellows of Harvard College) and from The Interior Landscape: Love Poems from a Classical Tamil Anthology by A.K. Ramanujan (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1967) are reprinted by permission.

MOTILAL BANARSIDASS

41 U.A. Bungalow Road, Jawahar Nagar, Delhi 110 007

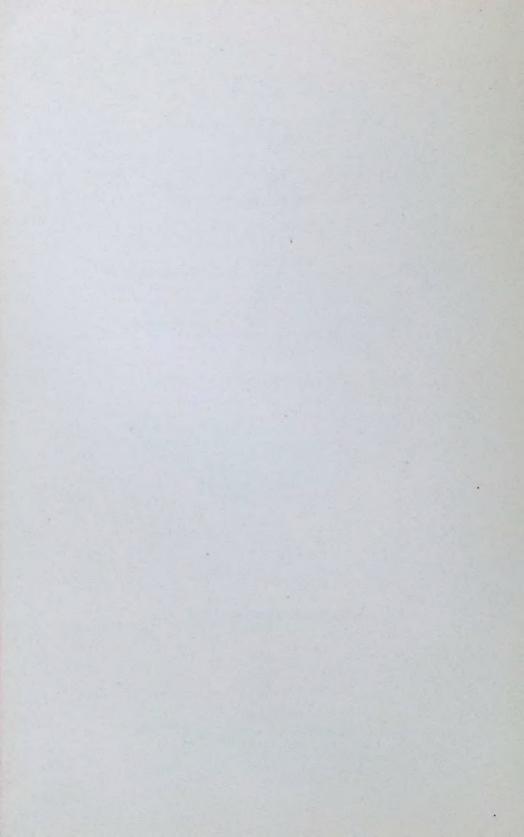

8 Mahalaxmi Chamber, 22 Bhulabhai Desai Road, Mumbai 400 026
203 Royapettah High Road, Mylapore, Chennai 600 004
236, 9th Main III Block, Jayanagar, Bangalore 560 011
Sanas Plaza, 1302 Baji Rao Road, Pune 411 002

8 Camac Street, Kolkata 700 017
Ashok Rajpath, Patna 800 004
Chowk, Varanasi 221 001

FOR SALE IN SOUTH ASIA ONLY

Printed in India
BY JAINENDRA PRAKASH JAIN AT SHRI JAINENDRA PRESS,
A-45 NARAINA, PHASE-I, NEW DELHI 110 028 AND PUBLISHED BY NARENDRA PRAKASH JAIN FOR MOTILAL BANARSIDASS PUBLISHERS PRIVATE LIMITED, BUNGALOW ROAD, DELHI 110 007

For my parents

27-6

CONTENTS

		1
LIST OF ILI	LUSTRATIONS AND MAP	ix
PREFACE		x
A NOTE ON TRANSLITERATION
GUIDE TO	GUIDE TO TAMIL PRONUNCIATION
	PART ONE
I-	atroduction: Poetry and Religion in the Songs of the Tamil Śaiva Saints
Chapter 1	The Study of the Tēvāram	3
Chapter 2	The Making of the Tēvāram: The Text and
	Its Context	8
Chapter 3	The Poets and Their Poems	19
Chapter 4	The Lives of a Text: The Role of the Tēvāram
	Hymns in Tamil Śaivism	51
Chapter 5	On Translating the Hymns	76
	PART TWO
	An Anthology of Hymns from the Tēvāram
Section I	Mūrtti: Images of the Lord	95
1. The Beautiful Lord (Poems 1–19)
2. The Lord Is All Things (Poems 20–28)
3. Nața	rāja: Lord of the Dance (Poems 29-36)	118
4. Bhiks	4. Bhikṣāṭana: The Beggar (Poems 37–39)
5. Šiva's	s Myths (Poems 40–54)	127
Section II	Kōyil, Ārūr: Beloved Abodes	143
1. The	Temple (Poems 55–68)	149
2. The Lord's Dear Town (Poems 69-73)
3. Sacred Landscapes (Poems 74-84)
4. Celebrations (Poems 85–99)

viii	CONTENTS

5. Brahmin Ways (Poems 100–103)	190
6. Talapurāṇam: Local Legends (Poems 104-126)	193
Section III Ațiyar: The Ways of Love	205
1. The Lord Is Sweet (Poems 127–143)
2. The Lord's Emblems (Poems 144-153)
3. Pain and Grace (Poems 154-180)
4. The Lord, My Lover (Poems 181-185)
5. Five Who Dwell Within (Poems 186–193)	251
6. Acts of Devotion (Poems 194–212)	255
7. Singing of Śiva (Poems 213–220)	265
Section IV Muvar Mutalikal: The First Three Saints	269
1. Campantar: The Blessed Child (Poems 221-233)	270
2. Appar: The Reformed Monk (Poems 234-245)	283
3. Cuntarar: The Lord's Comrade (Poems 246–258)	302
4. The Servants of the Lord (Poems 259–270)	323
APPENDIXES
A. Important Sacred Places in the Tēvāram	339
B. The Twenty-three Pan Scale-Types in the Tēvāram	341
C. Attavīrattāṇam: The Sites of the Eight Heroic Deeds of Śiva	342
D. Major Puranic Myths of Śiva in the Tēvāram	343
GLOSSARY	349
BIBLIOGRAPHY
INDEX OF POEMS	357 367
GENERAL INDEX	371

ILLUSTRATIONS AND MAP

Map. South India: Sacred Places Associated with the Tēvāram

2

(following page 208)

- 1. Cuntarar, Appar, and Campantar. Cola bronze; Pangal temple
- 2. Campantar with the cup of divine wisdom. Cola bronze; Nallambal temple
- 3. Appar, cradling his hoe in his arms. Cola bronze; Tirucchengodu temple
- 4. Cuntarar and his wife, Paravai Nācciyār. Cola bronze; Nallūr temple
- 5. Śiva: Linga. Stone, in sanctum; Nārttamalai
- 6. Šiva with the Goddess. Cola bronze; Tiruvēļvikkuți temple
- 7. Śiva as Ardhanārīśvara, the Lord who is half woman. Cōla bronze; Tiruveņkāţu temple
- 8. Śiva Naṭarāja, Lord of the Dance. Cola wall relief; Gangaikondacola-puram
- 9. Śiva Bhikṣāṭana, the Lord as beggar. Cola bronze; Tiruvaiyāru temple
- 10. Śiva manifesting himself in the cosmic linga. Cōla wall relief; Punjai temple
- 11. Rāvaņa tries to lift Kailāsa and is crushed by Śiva; Rāvaņānugrahamūrti. Cola wall relief; Tirunelvēli temple
- 12. Śiva saves the boy Mārkaṇḍeya from Death; Kāla-saṃhāra-mūrti. Cōla wall relief; Thanjavur, Brihadīśvara temple. Courtesy of Gary Tartakov
- 13. The central shrine structure (vimāna) in the main temple at Tiruvārūr. North façade
- 14. Nāṇacampanta Ōtuvār in the courtyard of Cīrkāli temple. Photo by the author

15. Verses from the Tēvāram (Appar IV.196) inscribed on the wall of Tiruvānmiyūr temple. Photo by the author

(Except where other copyright holders are specifically listed above, all illustrations are courtesy of, and copyright, the Institut français d'indologie, Pondicherry.)

As a child, I lived for a year with my grandmother in Mylapore, the old brahmin quarter of the city of Madras. The house was located on one of the four streets which form the square enclosing the ancient temple of Siva Kapālīśvara. In that year and in that place began my acquaintance with the Tēvāram, the hymns of three Tamil Śaiva poet-saints. Every evening at the temple I heard the clear, sweet voice of the hymn singer rise in song above the voices of the devotees worshipping at the shrine. The words were in Tamil, my mother tongue; they spoke eloquently of deep emotion, of sacred places, of God in beautiful landscapes. I was enchanted. In 1978 and 1979 I returned to Tamilnadu to study the performance and cultural milieu of the Tēvāram, as groundwork toward a translation of the hymns. This book is the result of that research and my work on the translations over a period of seven years.¹

My thanks go to the institutions whose generous support has made this book possible. Amherst College gave me a Miner Crary Memorial Research Fellowship (1978) to record the Tēvāram hymns in India; I received a Research Fellowship (1979–1980) from the National Endowment for the Humanities to study the performance tradition of the Tēvāram in India; and Mount Holyoke College gave me a Faculty Grant (1984) to help me complete the manuscript. I am grateful also to the following for their assistance: Yvonne Nicholson, for typing the first draft; Lee Weissman, for the loan of the Civastalamañcari, which helped me identify some of the ancient shrines associated with the Tēvāram; cartographer Roy Doyon, for executing the map; and Elizabeth Gretz, for skillful copyediting. It has been a pleasure to work with Margaret Case, my editor at Princeton University Press. Her excellent editorial advice and suggestions have made this a better book in every way.

Lalgudi M. Swaminathan, ōtuvār at the Kapālīśvara temple in Madras, and Nāṇacampanta Ōtuvār, of the Caṭṭainātar temple at Cīrkāli, initiated me into the world of Tēvāram singing. Their beautiful voices and superb rendering of the hymns have truly enriched my understanding of the Tēvāram. I also wish to thank the ōtuvārs I interviewed and recorded in Tanjayur, Tīruvārūr, Maturai, Tīruvānmiyūr, Tarumapuram, and at the

¹ A cassette tape of selections from ōtuvār performances of the Tēvāram hymns is available from the author. Readers interested in obtaining a copy should write to Indira Peterson, Committee on Asian Studies, Mount Holyoke College, South Hadley, Mass, 01075.

xii PREFACE

1979–1980 conference on pan research in Madras for sharing genrously of their time and talent.

His Holiness Canmuka Tēcika Nāṇacampanta Paramācāriya Cuvāmikaļ of the Tarumapuram Ātīṇam and members of the Ātīṇam center in Tarumapuram and Madras gave their gracious and enthusiastic support to my venture. I spent several delightful and informative days with Vēlā-yuta Ötuvär's class of young trainees at Tarumapuram.

I have gained in insight from discussion and exchange of ideas with the following scholars in India at various stages of my study: K. Vellaivāraṇaṇ, François Gros, K.K.A. Venkatachari, V. A. Devasenapathy, P. S. Somasundaram, P. Cuntarēcaṇ, B. Natarajan, and N. R. Murukavēl. My particular thanks to François Gros and the Institut français d'indologie for supplying excellent photographs for the book from their archives in Pondicherry, and for delivering them to me in record time.

I owe a special debt of gratitude to George L. Hart III, A. K. Ramanujan, and Barbara Miller, colleagues and mentors, eminent scholars and translators in the field, who read the translations in draft versions. The translations have benefited greatly from their suggestions and advice, their keen sense of poetry, and their high standards of translation.

David Reck has long been my colleague, friend, and partner in the study and performance of South Indian music. Always encouraging me in my study of Tēvāram performance, he helped prepare and house at Amherst College the tapes that I made in 1978 and 1979 in India. Gary Tartakov of Iowa State University has followed the progress of this book from its inception and has generously contributed a photograph from his personal archives. John Carman, Dennis Hudson, Alan Babb, Glenn Yocum, Vidya Dehejia, Norman Cutler, and David Shulman have all shared their ideas on Tamil bhakti and encouraged me in my work; my thanks to them. Thanks also to Tēvāram fans Durai Raja Singam, Leila Diraviyam, and N. R. Damodaran for their help and encouragement.

My parents, R. Viswanathan and Jaya Viswanathan, have aided and encouraged my work in every possible way, at every step of the project. Other members of my extended family in India—uncles, aunts, and cousins—opened their homes and hearts to me in Madras and South India: Mr. and Mrs. S. S. Sundharesan, the late Dr. V. Srinivasamurthy, Mr. and Mrs. V. Sankar, Mr. and Mrs. S. Krishnamurthy, and Mr. and Mrs. A. N.

Jagannatha Rao.

My husband, Mark, has participated, kindly and cheerfully, in every aspect of the making of this book: discussing my work, subjecting draft translations to a clear-eyed reading, teaching me the intricacies of word-processing. Above all, his love, friendship, and encouragement have sustained me through the most frustrating moments and deepened the many joys of writing and translation. My daughter, Maya, was born at the same time that I began the first draft. I hope that someday, when she reads this book, she will appreciate the study that engaged her mother's mind during the time that she grew from an infant into a little girl.

PREFACE xiii

I am pleased at last to be able to acknowledge my debts of gratitude to all of the people and institutions who have helped me in my work on the Tēvāram hymns. I know that they will share my joy at seeing the book in print.

A NOTE ON TRANSLITERATION

Wherever names of major figures in pan-Hindu mythology and culture occur, I have used the standard transliteration for the Sanskrit: e.g., Śiva, Bhagīratha, rāga, Viṣṇu. The names of figures, places, and concepts occurring exclusively in Tamil culture and religion, including the majority of the place names in the Tēvāram hymns, have been transliterated according to the system provided in the Tamil Lexicon (University of Madras, 1936): e.g., Campantar, akam, Iṭaimarutūr. When referring, in a general context, to monuments and place names in common usage in contemporary Tamil, I have adopted the popular, nonscholarly transliteration: e.g., Chidambaram, Kaveri, Tamilnadu.

NOTE: Masculine names and epithets ending in -n in Tamil substitute -r for the final -n in plural and honorific forms. E.g., Campantan, Campantar (honorific); pattan, pattar (plural/honorific). In the case of honorifics, the usage is contextual.

GUIDE TO TAMIL PRONUNCIATION

Vowels

a	like u in but.	е	like e in pet or bench.
ā*	like a in father.	ē*	similar to a in cake.
i	like i in it.	ai	like i in pipe.
ī*	similar to ee in keep.	0	like the first o in potato.
u	like u in put.	ō*	similar to the oin open or oak.
51 W	similar to oo in coop.	211	like ow in fowl.

*The asterisked long vowels are purer than their English counterparts and closer to Italian vowels.

CONSONANTS AND NASALS

k (guttural) like the English k; the nasal \dot{n} is used with k: e.g., mankai.

c (palatal) similar to ch in chalk, but unaspirated; the nasal \bar{n} is used with c: e.g., ne \bar{n} cu. The following sounds that have come into Tamil from Sanskrit are also represented by c: (palatal) δ , pronounced "sh"; and s, similar to the English s: e.g., civan (Siva), pronounced as "S(h)ivan" or "Sivan."

- t a retroflex sound, pronounced with the tongue curled back so that it touches the roof of the mouth; n is the retroflex nasal: e.g., tontar.
- t (dental) similar to t in French or Italian; the nasal n is used with t.
- p like the English p; the nasal m is used with p.

Tamil consonants are pronounced without the slight aspiration that is characteristic of the pronunciation of similar consonants in English.

SEMIVOWELS

- y, r, l, and v similar to their English counterparts; the r is rolled.
- 1 similar to the American r, as in American or first.
- l pronounced as a retroflex sound.

r AND n

In origin, \underline{r} and \underline{n} are closer to alveolar sounds than r and the other nasal sounds of Tamil; however, \underline{r} and r are almost indistinguishable in contemporary pronunciation; the combination $\underline{r}\underline{r}$, as in $Ci\underline{r}\underline{r}ampalam$, is pronounced like tr in country.

SPECIAL RULES

Initially (i.e., at the beginning of a word) and between vowels, c is pronounced like the English s.

Between vowels, k, t, and p are voiced, and pronounced as g or h, d, d, and b.

Following a nasal, k, c, t, and p are voiced, and pronounced as g, j, d, d, and b.

Thus Campantar is pronounced as Samban'dar, Cuntarar as Sun'darar, Cankam as Sangam, akam as aham, Murukan as Murugan, Añcai as Anjai, and pātam as pādam.

Doubled consonants are given full value and held longer. E.g., Kacci is pronounced as "kac(h)c(h)i."

SOUNDS FROM SANSKRIT

In addition to δ and δ , the following Sanskrit letters have been incorporated into Tamil orthography and the sound system of Tamil:

the retroflex sibilant, as in Visnu.

kş the combination of k and s as in Kşēttirakkovai.

i like english j.

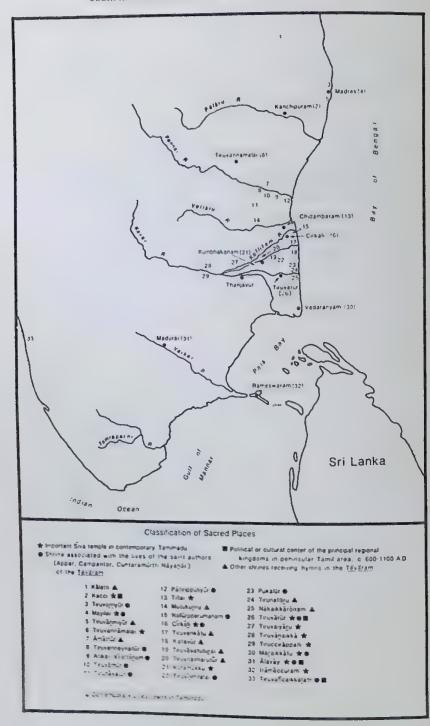

h like English h.

The voiced sounds of Sanskrit (g, d etc.) are represented by their unvoiced counterparts (k, t etc.) in Tamil.

Tamil has no true counterparts for the aspirated sounds (kh, gh, etc.) of Sanskrit.

PART ONE

Introduction: Poetry and Religion in the Songs of the Tamil Śaiva Saints

The Study of the Tēvāram

The poems translated in this book are Tamil hymns of devotion to the Hindu god Śiva.¹ The poets, Tiruñanacampantar (popularly known as Campantar or Ñanacampantar), Tirunavukkaracar (Appar), and Cuntaramurtti (Cuntarar), lived between the sixth and eighth centuries A.D. in the Tamil linguistic-cultural region of India. They are celebrated as the principal saint-leaders or Nāyanar ("leader, master") of the Tamil Śaiva sect (see illus. 1).² The collection of the three saints' hymns, entitled the Tēvāram, serves as the primary scripture for Tamil Śaivas.

To study the $T\bar{e}v\bar{a}ram$ is to study more than a text. In understanding the meanings and contexts of the saints' hymns we move closer to an understanding of the religion, world view, and values of the people of Tamilnadu, where nearly every village has a temple to Siva and every temple is linked to the lives and songs of the saints. The $T\bar{e}v\bar{a}ram$ also guides us into the world of classical Tamil civilization, for it is heir to the rich and sophisticated tradition of classical Tamil poetry, while the melodic setting of the hymns gives us clues to the ancient musical system of the Tamils.³

The Tamil regional cults of the worship of Siva and Visnu, which arose

- ¹ Siva is one of the three supreme gods of the classical Hindu pantheon. The worship of Siva and Viṣṇu forms the basis of the broad division of Hindus into the Saiva and Vaiṣṇava sects.
- ² Tamil is the language of the Tamil community of the present-day state of Tamilnadu in South India and of ethnic Tamils who live elsewhere. Tamil is the oldest representative of the Dravidian group of languages, which is distinct from the Indo-Aryan family of languages represented by Sanskrit and most of the languages of North India. For a general history of Tamil culture, see K. A. Nilakanta Sastri, The Culture and History of the Tamils (Calcutta: Firma K. L. Mukhopadhyay, 1964). In Tamil, the Tamil Śaiva saints are also collectively known as the "Nāyanmār" (the Tamil plural of nāyaṇār).
- ³ Except for early inscriptions, the earliest documents we have of Tamil civilization are the anthologies of sophisticated classical poetry from the age of the Cankam ("academy") (A.D. first-third centuries). In The Poems of Ancient Tamil: Their Milieu and Their Sanskrit Counterparts (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1975), George L. Hart III discusses this literature in its cultural and historical context.

and flourished between the fifth and ninth centuries A.D. and later grew into the Tamil Śaiva and Vaiṣṇava sects, were among the first cults devoted to bhakti, a popular religion of emotional devotion to a personal God, which eventually permeated the Hindu tradition in all its aspects. The hymns of the Nāyaṇārs and the Ālvārs, the early Tamil Śaiva and Vaiṣṇava saints, may be credited with many "firsts": they are the first literary expression of emotional bhakti; the first sizable corpus of full-fledged "religious" poems in Tamil; and the first Hindu sectarian scripture in a vernacular language. The Tēvāram claims distinction in other ways as well, particularly in the ease with which it straddles diverse categories in Indian religion, literature, and culture: "Sanskritic" and vernacular domains; classical and popular literature; universal and local themes in bhakti and the Hindu religious tradition; scripture and popular

The Sanskrit term bhakti, meaning "partaking (of God), participation, loving devotion," derived from the root bhaj-, has been broadly applied both to a type of religiosity and to the popular movements through which devotional religion spread in India. The idea of bhakti in the sense of "devotion to a personal god" is present in early Hindu philosophical texts in Sanskrit that predated the Tamil bhakti cults by several centuries, most prominently in the Svetasvatara Upanisad and the Bhagavad Gita (A.D. first-second centuries). Textual and iconographic evidence from the early Christian era also points to the existence of devotional cults involving image worship, a practice that was not part of the theism of the early Vedic religion. However, the emotional devotionalism of the Tamil cults was a new development in Hinduism. On early bhakti religion, see Thomas J. Hopkins, The Hindu Religious Tradition (Encino, Calif.: Dickenson, 1971), chs. 5, 6, 7. For a general introduction to bhakti religion and poetry, see A. K. Ramanujan, Speaking of Siva (Baltimore: Penguin, 1973) and idem, Hymns for the Drowning: Poems for Vișnu by Nammalvar (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1981). On the evolution of emotional bhakti, see Friedhelm Hardy, Viraha-Bhakti: The Early History of Krsna Devotion in South India (Delhi: Oxford University Press, 1983).

'Although the classical Tamil poems were deeply imbued with the indigenous Tamil view of the sacred, religion is not their primary concern. The earliest Tamil works with an explicitly religious focus are the Paripāṭal and Tirumurukāṭruppaṭai, two late classical texts (A.D. sixth-seventh centuries). Addressed to Tirumāl (Viṣṇu) and the Tamil hill-god Murukaṇ, these early poems qualify as bhakṭi literature. On bhakṭi in the two classical texts, see Ramanujan, Hymns, pp. 109–17. For a discussion of the poetry of the Śaiva saint Kāṭaikkāl Ammaiyār and the three Vaiṣṇava poet-saints who preceded the authors of the Tēvāram, see Norman Cutler, Songs of Experience: The Poetics of Tamil Devotion (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1986).

* The hymns of the four Vedas (Rig, Sāma, Yajur, and Atharva; 1200–800 B.C.), which are in Vedic Sanskrit, are considered to be śruti, "revealed" (lit., "heard") literature and the highest scripture of the Hindus. Within Hinduism, until the rise of the popular bhakti cults and sects in the South, all sacred texts were written in Sanskrit, the "language of the gods" (deva-vāni). The use of Pāli and Prakrit (vernacular dialects related to Sanskrit) for religious literature was one of the innovative and revolutionary strategies of Buddhism and Jainism, the two great popular religions of ancient India, which rose in opposition to brahmanical Hinduism around the sixth century B.C. The hymns of the Tamil saints are thus the first Hindu religious literature to be written in a language other than Sanskrit. See my discussion of the Tevaram as the Tamil Veda in Chapter 4 below.

song; written and oral texts; the celebration of tradition and the poetry of an innovative movement; and personal and communal religion. In Part One I have sought to present the text in its multidimensional richness, to locate it in as many of its contexts as possible. I have tried not only to inform the reader in regard to the religious settings and significance of the saints' hymns but also to give a sense of the ways in which Tamil Śaivas experience these religious poems. In the process, I have explored the broader issue of the role of sacred texts, and of poetry in particular, in Tamil bhakti.

Among the regional languages of India, Tamil alone had an early classical civilization, religion, and literature of its own, quite distinct from the Indo-Aryan heritage of Sanskrit and brahmanism. Although the indigenous Dravidian civilization of the Tamils was progressively "Sanskritized" by early contact with the brahmanical civilization of the North, it retained its distinctive character even as late as the period of the Tamil Saiva saints. As the first literary expressions of a popular and regional religious culture in Hinduism, the Tēvāram hymns reflected many features of Tamil culture, and differed in many respects from the authoritative sacred texts of the Great Tradition, composed in Sanskrit, the classical language of the brahmanical civilization. At the same time, they provided a powerful new synthesis of the values of brahmanical Hinduism and those of the indigenous Tamil civilization, affirming, celebrating, and transforming both traditions.8

The Tēvāram is not only the document and expression of an important moment, a turning point in the history of Hinduism and of Tamil regional culture, but a broader cultural phenomenon, one that has been "a great living, moving force" in the lives of the Tamils. Like other formative or fundamental religious texts, the Tēvāram has transcended and transformed its literary, religious, and cultural contexts, itself becoming an important, continuing context for Tamil Śaiva religiosity. In its capacity as the scripture of the Tamil Śaiva sect, this text has had a life of its own and has functioned as a symbol and motivator of sectarian and communal identity. Indeed, crossing the boundary of the strictly "religious," it has played an important part in shaping the ethnic-national consciousness of the Tamils as a whole. The study of the Tēvāram calls for a synchronic as well as a diachronic approach: the former, in order to study the poems in their "historical moment" and to trace their career through the history of Tamil Śaivism; the latter, in order to understand the great symbolic value of the Tēvāram for practicing Tamil Śaivas today.

⁷ I use the term "Sanskritic" broadly, to refer to those aspects of Indian culture and civilization that are primarily associated with the Sanskrit language and pan-Hindu civilization, especially in relation to early brahmanical Hinduism.

^a A. K. Ramanujan discusses the contrasts between Sanskrit texts and vernacular bhakti texts in Ramanujan, Speaking of Siva, pp. 37–48, 134–39. Frits Staal has demonstrated the complexity of the process that has been called "Sanskritization"; he points out that this is in fact a two-way process in which vernacular and Sanskritic elements continually influence each other. J. Frits Staal, "Sanskrit and Sanskritization," Journal of Asian Studies 22, no. 3 (May 1963): 261–75.

⁹ Kamil V. Zvelebil, Tamil Literature, in Handbuch der Orientalistik, Zweite Abteilung, Indien, ed. Jan Gonda, Band 2: Literatur und Bühne, Abschnitt 1 (Leiden/Cologne: E. J. Brill, 1975), p. 32, note 19.

The bhakti lyrics of the Nāyaṇārs differ in many respects from the poetry of the saints of later bhakti cults in other regions of India. Dapar, Campantar, and Cuntarar have more in common with their Tamil Vaiṣṇava counterparts and the later Tamil Śaiva saint Māṇikkavācakar, but there are significant differences here as well. The importance of the Tēvāram for the study of bhakti can hardly be stressed enough. Yet the slim volume of selected translations offered by Kingsbury and Phillips in 1921 remains the only translation available to the English-speaking world. The size and specialized nature of Dorai Rangaswamy's study of Cuntarar and his poems prevent it from becoming an accessible introduction to the hymns of the three saints. The Tēvāram needs to be translated and described in context at least in order to clarify the history of bhakti

10 Eleanor Zelliot notes some of these differences in her essay on regional bhakti cults. Zelliot, "The Medieval Bhakti Movement in History: An Essay on the Literature in English," in Hinduism: New Essays in the History of Religions, ed. Bardwell L. Smith (Leiden:

E. J. Brill, 1976), pp. 143-68.

in The Saiva Nāyaṇārs and the Vaiṣṇava Ālvārs were contemporaries, fellows, and rivals in the great religious movement that swept over the Tamil region in the sixth, seventh, and eighth centuries A.D. The similarities of vision are reflected in a shared vocabulary and imagery. For an excellent treatment of the Tamil poet-saints as members of a single religious and poetic universe, see Cutler, Songs of Experience. In addition to the early bhakti saints, Cutler also deals with the later saints Māṇikkavācakar (Śaiva) and Nammālvār (Vaiṣṇava). Glenn E. Yocum treats the contrasts between the two traditions in "Sign and Paradigm: Myth in Tamil Śaiva and Vaiṣṇava bhakti Poetry," in Structural Approaches to South India Studies, ed. Harry M. Buck and Glenn E. Yocum (Chambersburg, Pa.: Anima Books, 1974), pp. 184–206. Again, on the devotionalism of Māṇikkavācakar (A.D. ninth century?), consult Glenn E. Yocum, Hymns to the Dancing Śiva: A Study of Māṇikkavācakar's Tiruvācakam (New Delhi: Heritage, 1982).

12 F. Kingsbury and G. E. Phillips, Hymns of the Tamil Saivite Saints (Calcutta: Association Press; London: Oxford University Press, 1921). The authors provide translations of 79 out of the 8,284 stanzas of the Tēvāram. None of the hymns has been translated in its entirety.

13 M. A. Dorai Rangaswamy, The Religion and Philosophy of Tēvāram; with Special Reference to Nampi Ārūrar (Sundarar), 4 vols. in 2 books (Madras: University of Madras, 1958–1959). In the most recent edition of the Tēvāram hymns, François Gros has written an excellent introduction to the study of the text. Gros, "Introduction: Toward Reading the Tēvāram;" in Tēvāram: Hymnes Šivaites du pays tamoul, vol. I: Nāṇacampantar, ed. T. V. Gopal Iyer, general editor: François Gros, Publications de l'Institut français d'indologie no. 68.1 (Pondicherry: Institut français d'indologie, 1984), pp. xxxvii–lxviii.

religion and literature. As the poetry of exemplary "leaders" whose lives and ideas have been, and continue to be, a powerful influence on the Tamils, the hymns of the Nāyaṇārs ought to be made accessible to all who are interested in Indian civilization. This introductory essay and the translations that follow in Part Two represent my contributions toward that goal.

The Making of the Tēvāram: The Text and Its Context

At the time of the rise of Tamil bhakti, the Tamil linguistic-cultural area covered most of peninsular India south of the hill of Vēňkaṭam, and roughly corresponded to the region made up of the three Tamil kingdoms of the Caňkam classical age, ruled by the Pāṇṭiya (Pandya), Cōla, and Cēra kings.¹ In this region, such basic elements of brahmanical Hinduism as the Vedas and Vedic sacrifice, the Vedic-brahmanical gods, and the veneration of brahmins as specialists in the sacred had already become part of Tamil religion and culture; at the same time, aspects of the earlier indigenous religion played an important part in the shaping of Tamil Śaivism and Vaiṣṇavism.² Buddhism and Jainism, the great "heterodox" religions of India, had also come early to the South and flourished in the Tamil region.³

The age of the three ancient Tamil kingdoms came to an end around the third century A.D. Little is known about the history of the region in the three centuries that followed, except the rise of the Pallavas, a non-Tamil dynasty that ruled from the city of Kanchipuram. The Pallava Mahendravarman I (seventh century) was the first ruler powerful enough to be able to establish a measure of stability in Tamil India. Poet, artist, and builder of the first rock-cut temples in South India, Mahendravarman was a great patron of the arts and local cultural activity. However, like the imperial Guptas of the North, the Pallava ruler identified more with the Great Tradition connoted by Sanskrit, the enduring language and symbol of pan-Indian civilization, than with the "local" classical tradition of the Tamils. Buddhism and Jainism were the dominant religions in Mahendravarman's kingdom. According to tradition, the king himself practiced Jainism until his friend, the saint Appar, persuaded him to convert to Śaivism. It was in this atmosphere that the Tamil Śaiva and Vaiṣṇava bhakti movements blossomed.

¹ The three ancient Tamil kingdoms or nātus were: Cōlanāţu, with its old capital at Urai-yūr; Pāṇṭiyanāţu, with Maturai (Madurai) as its capital; and Cēranāṭu, with the city of Vañci as its capital. For the early history of these kingdoms, refer to Nilakanta Sastri, Culture and History. The names of the kingdoms continued as designations for later kingdoms and macro-regions in the Tamil region. On the subdivisions of the Tamil region, see Burton Stein, Peasant State and Society in Medieval India (Delhi: Oxford University Press, 1980).

² On the Sanskritization of the early indigenous culture of the Tamils, see Hart, Poems, ch. 4. Hart points out that though the Cankam poems do show the influence of "northern" religion, ideas, and customs, Sanskritization was much more pervasive in the post-Cankam age, when Buddhist and Jain influences were strong, as reflected in the fifth-century epic Calappantkāram. The indigenous Tamil currents in bhakti religion are discussed in Glenn E. Yocum, "Shrines, Shamanism and Love Poetry: Elements in the Emergence of Popular Tamil Bhakti," Journal of the American Academy of Religion 41, no. 1 (March 1973): 3–17.

³ K. A. Nilakanta Sastri, Development of Religion in South India (Madras: Orient Longmans, 1963), gives a general account of Buddhism and Jainism in South India.

Bhakti was a popular religion of intimate relationship with a gracious God, and the new bhakti devotionalism was characterized by ecstatic modes of expression. Under the leadership of poet-saints who sang songs of passionate and total devotion for their God not in Sanskrit but in Tamil, their mother tongue, people from every segment of Tamil society gathered to form devotional communities that cut across caste, sex, and other hierarchies of orthodox Hinduism. In all these respects the early Tamil bhakti cults were models for the regional bhakti movements that followed them. The Tamil movement is better characterized, however, as a movement toward communal solidarity than as an expression of social protest. Although many later bhakti movements arose primarily as reactions against the Hindu "orthodoxy" and the established forms and practices of brahmanical Hinduism, the early Tamil bhakti cults saw themselves as the champions of the Hindu tradition and, more important, of a ⁴ On the Pallavas and Kanchipuram, see T. V. Mahalingam, Kāñcīpuram in Early South Indian History (New York: Asia, 1969).

⁵ According to Nilakanta Sastri, Culture and History, p. 19, the Kalabhras who preceded the Pallavas were "evil rulers" and "an enemy of civilization." On the life and achievements of Mahendravarman I (A.D. 580–630), consult Mahalingam, Kāñcipuram, ch. 4.

⁶ The rock-cut temples are in Mahabalipuram.

[&]quot;The Gupta emperors (A.D. 320-540), who ruled from Ujjain in North India, were great patrons of Saiva and Vaisnava cults, and initiated the great age of temple building in Hinduism. On the relationship between Sanskrit and the civilization of the imperial Guptas, see Daniel H. H. Ingalls, "Kālidāsa and the Attitudes of the Golden Age," Journal of the American Oriental Society 96, no. 1 (January-March 1976): 15-26; on Mahendravarman and the Gupta patterns, see Ramanujan, Hymns, pp. 104-6. Mahendravarman was an accomplished writer in Sanskrit and wrote the Sanskrit play Mattavilāsa.

^{*} Mahalingam, Kāñcīpuram, p. 75.

⁹ On these characteristics of bhakti religion see Ramanujan, Speaking of Śiva, pp. 19–48, and Hymns, pp. 115–26, 150–57. In his discussion, Ramanujan brings out the intimate relationship between bhakti as personal religion and the idea of the "mother" tongue.

Tamil Hindu religion, one that was truly harmonious and continuous with the Tamil religious and cultural past. It is clear from the hymns of the Nayanars and Alvars that the "enemy" was not brahmanical Hinduism, or Sanskritic religious modes, but Buddhism and Jainism, which were seen as alien to Tamil culture, defined by the new cults as an intrinsically Hindu culture.

Campantar devotes a verse in each of his hymns to invective against Buddhist and Jain monks, and Appar rails against the Jains who had led him away from Saivism. The lives and poems of these two saints indicate a shift in the role of Jainism and Buddhism in the Tamil region. The two heterodox religions had been in the mainstream of Tamil culture in the early centuries of the Christian era. Jain and Buddhist authors and thinkers had made great contributions to Tamil literature. Ilankovatikal, the author of the Tamil national epic Cilappatikāram, was a Jain monk. 10 This fifth-century author celebrated the land of the three Tamil kingdoms and portrayed the Hindu, Jain, and Buddhist religions as coexisting harmoniously in the Tamil region. Less than two hundred years later. Campantar condemns the Jain and Buddhist monks of his time as corrupt rogues who speak neither good Tamil nor the Sanskrit language but mutilate both, babbling in the Prakrit dialects; and he speaks with deep revulsion of the Jain ascetic practices of nudity, tonsure, and abstaining from bathing and cleaning the teeth. Burton Stein has convincingly argued that such hostility reflects the ethos of a newly formed cultural and ideological alliance between the brahmins and peasants of the Tamil plains region. It is also likely that the bhakti saints were reacting to groups of Jain and Buddhist monks who had recently arrived in the Tamil country from the Kannada and Telugu areas in the northern part of the peninsula, and who were truly strangers to the Tamil language and culture.11 The hagiographical accounts, and some of the Tevaram hymns themselves, suggest that the bhakti cult leaders had to compete with powerful Jain and Buddhist monks to gain and retain royal support for their religion. Finally, though it can be argued that the ascetic temper of the two heterodox religions was largely confined to the monastic life and that they were closer to the Hindu bhakti cults in lay practice, there is nothing in early Jain and Buddhist devotional religion that comes close to the sensuous, often erotic, aestheticism of early Tamil bhakti, its exaltation of the personal, ecstatic experience of God, and its exuberant expression of love. These bhakti characteristics were uniquely bound, on the one hand, with ritual religion and on the other, with the classical culture and aesthetic of the Tamils. The mythology and cultural contexts of the Hindu gods were more congenial to the spirit of a new personal religion in the framework of Tamil civilization than Buddhism and Jainism could be. The bhakti saints' aversion to the two heterodox religions was based as much on aesthetic as on doctrinal grounds.

10 In his epic Iļankovaņkaļ celebrates the Cola, Pāņņiya, and Cēra kingdoms.

¹¹ Stein, Peasant State, ch. 2. C. V. Narayana Ayyar makes the point about "alien" Jains in Origin and Early History of Saivism in South India (Madras: University of Madras, 1939, 1974), ch. 10. Basing his theory on epigraphical and other evidence, he suggests that the opponents of the bhakti saints were Jains who had migrated to the Tamil region from the Kadamba and Western Calukya kingdoms situated to the north of Tamilnadu, and had acquired the support of kings and chieftains in the Tamil region in the sixth century. For further details, see P. S. Somasundaram, Tirujñānasambandhar: Philosophy and Religion (Madras: Vani Pathippakam, 1986), pp. 209–11. For some reasons for the decline of Buddhism and Jainism in Tamil India after the sixth century, see Kamil Zvelebil, The Smile of Maragan: On Tamil Literature of South India (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1973), pp. 194–97.

The importance given to the temple and ritual worship in the Tēvāram hymns highlights the most striking feature of early Tamil bhakti. Many later bhakti sects protested against or detached themselves from image, temple, and ritual worship. ¹⁴ By contrast, the Tamil cults were closely associated with the teaching and ethos of the large body of ritualistic literature called the Āgamas and Tantras, which developed along with the spread of theism, image worship, and temple worship in Hinduism. ¹⁵ From the age of the poet-saints to the present, the temple or shrine has occupied a central position in the literature and practice of Tamil Śaivism and Vaiṣṇavism. ¹⁶ The Śaiva Āgamas give detailed expositions of ritual practice in connection with temple worship; they also provide a comprehensive description of devotional acts in a fourfold system that is relevant

¹² A. K. Ramanujan rightly points out that the popular, vernacular, communal, and devotional aspects of the Tamil Hindu bhakti cults probably owe more to devotional practice in Jainism and Buddhism in South India than has been acknowledged. See Ramanujan, Hynfins, pp. 126, 140, 142–46.

13 For a detailed discussion of Campantar in relation to Jainism and Buddhism, see Somasundaram, Tirujñāṇasambandhar, ch. 5.

¹⁴ Ramanujan describes the medieval Virasaiva sect as rejecting both the "great" and the "little" traditions of Hinduism (Speaking of Śiva, pp. 22–31). He notes that the rejection included classical belief systems, superstitions, image worship, the caste system, and the Vedic ritual, as well as local sacrifices of lambs and goats (p. 30).

¹⁵ For a succinct exposition of the role of the Āgamas in Śaiva religion, see Jean Filliozat, "The Role of the Śaivāgamas in the Śaiva Ritual System," in Experiencing Śiva: Encounters with a Hindu Deity, ed. Fred W. Clothey and J. Bruce Long (Columbia, Mo.: South Asia Books, 1983), pp. 81–86. Jan Gonda, Medieval Religious Literature in Sanskrit. A History of Indian Literature, vol. II, fasc. 1 (Wiesbaden: Otto Harrassowitz, 1977), contains a detailed historical survey of the Āgamas and related literature.

16 On the role of the temple in South Indian religion, see Burton Stein, ed., South Indian Temples: An Analytical Reconsideration (Delhi: Vikas, 1978), especially the essay by Friedhelm Hardy, "Ideology and Cultural Contexts of the Śrīvaiṣṇava Temple," pp. 119-51. M. A. Dorai Rangaswamy discusses the centrality of temples in the Tamil Śaiva cult in bk. 1, ch. 1 of The Religion and Philosophy of Tēvāram. David Shulman, Tamil Temple Myths: Sacrifice and Divine Marriage in the South Indian Śaiva Tradition (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1980), is an excellent study of the meaning of the temple in Tamil religion.

to our understanding of early Tamil devotional religion as described in the Tevaram and forms the framework of Tamil Śaiva philosophy as later formulated by the Śaiva Siddhānta.¹⁷ The literature of the Āgamas is an important link between the exoteric and esoteric aspects of Tamil bhakti. It is this Āgamic flavor that sets the religion of the Nāyaṇārs and Vaiṣṇava Āļvars apart from the devotionalism of even the more traditionalist of the later bhakti saints in other regions of India.¹⁸

Tirumurai: The Canonization of the Tēvāram

In the Tëvāram hymns we have the earliest literary evidence of a vigorous popular Tamil bhakti cult centering on Siva. 19 The poet-saints portray Siva as the bhakti God whose grace ends his devotees' karma. We hear of Appar, Campantar, and Cuntarar traveling with fellow devotees from all castes and walks of life to worship and sing of Siva at the many shrines that dotted the Tamil countryside, especially along the banks of the river Kaveri. Kings who had been seduced by "the false doctrines of the heretic Jain and Buddhist monks" are rescued and brought back into the fold of "Tamil" religion, thanks to our poets, who defeat their opponents in public debate and establish the superiority of Saivism over all other creeds. We get glimpses of the lives of the three saints as well as of other Saiva devotees, who "dance, weep, worship him, sing his [the Lord's] feet." Above all, we get a vivid impression of a growing Tamil Saiva community whose members are united by their passionate love for Siva and his shrines.

Even within the Tamil Śaiva literary tradition, the Tēvāram songs are distinguished by their pervasive orientation to shrines and sacred places. The poet-saints dedicated nearly every one of their hymns to a temple of Śiva. Together, Appar, Campantar, and Cuntarar sang hymns to Śiva as the god of shrines situated in 274 sacred places (pati, talam). Of these, 269 are South Indian shrines the saints visited in their pilgrimages; the remaining shrines belong to the Himalayan regions in the North, which are associated with the pan-Indian myths of Śiva. The Nāyaṇārs concen-

^{1&}quot; Tamil "caiva cittantam."

¹⁸ Aspects of ritualistic bhakti can be found in the devotional compositions of the composers of South Indian classical (Carnatic) music in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. See Indira V. Peterson, "The krti as an Integrative Cultural Form: Aesthetic Experience in the Religious Songs of Two South Indian Composers," Journal of South Asian Literature 19, no. 2 (Fall-Winter 1984): 165–79.

¹⁹ There are few reterences to Siva in classical Tamil literature, though such early works as the Purananūru do refer to him and his myths; see Hart, Poems, p. 56, and Narayana Ayyar, Origin and Early History of Sairism in South India, ch. 7.

²⁰ Campantar 1.75.10 (Poem 54).

²¹ Appar V.177.8 (Poem 204),

trated their travels in the Côla country (Côlanațu), singing hymns at 190 shrines in this segment of the Tamil region; the rest are distributed among the regional divisions of Pāṇṭināṭu (14 shrines), Toṇṭaināṭu (32), Naṭunāṭu (22), Koṅkunāṭu (7), and the Cēra area, later known as Malaināṭu (1). Two hymns are devoted to shrines in the northern part of the island of Sri Lanka (Ilam), and one to Tirukkōkarṇam in the Tulu country. By unifying the many sacred places of Śiva through a network of pilgrimages and hymns, the three saints created a Śaiva "sacred geography" for the Tamil land.²²

The history of Tamil Śaivism in the three hundred years following the activity of the poet-saints is literally carved in stone and inscribed on copperplates and palm leaves.²³ This was the great age of Tamil Śaivism as the "official" religion of the Tamils, and of the completion and compilation of the canonical texts of Tamil Śaivism. The Pallava successors of Mahendravarman I and the Tamil Cōlas who consolidated their power in the Tamil region in the tenth century were great patrons of the Tamil bhakti groups.²⁴ The Cōlas, in particular, favored Śaivism and gave royal support to the institutions and practice of Tamil Śaivism. In their time, the agricultural region watered by the river Kaveri, the birthplace of Tamil Śaiva bhakti and the area once ruled by the Cōla kings in the Cańkam age, again became the political heartland of the Tamil land, and the great Śaiva temple and cult centers of Tiruvārūr and Tillai (Chidambaram) in the Kaveri Delta replaced Pallava Kanchipuram as centers of political as well as sacred power. The political map of the Tamil region

²² For a list of shrines and sacred places that are repeatedly invoked in the Tēvāram hymns, see Appendix A in this volume. Some of these sites are shown on the map of important sacred places associated with the Tēvāram (p. 2, above). On sacred geography in the hymns of Appar, Cuntarar, and Campantar, see George W. Spencer, "The Sacred Geography of the Tamil Shaivite Hymns," Numen 17 (1970): 232–44. Spencer provides an analysis and detailed maps of the range and distribution of the Tēvāram shrines. He points out that the densest clustering of shrines is found in the contemporary district of Thanjavur (Tanjore) in Tamilnadu. Ka. Velļaivāraņaņ, Panņiru tirumurai varalāru: Mutal ēļu tirumuraikal (Annamalainagar: Annamalai University, 1972), gives a complete index of the 274 Tēvāram shrines. For the sacred geography of the hymns of the Tamil Vaiṣṇava saints, consult Katherine K. Young, Beloved Places (Ukantaruļiṇanilaṅkal): The Correlation of Topography and Theology in the Śrīvaiṣṇava Tradition of South India (Delhi: Motilal Banarsidass, 1984); and Hardy, Viraha-Bhaktī.

²³ The rock-cut temples of Śiva are rich in cult-related sculpture and inscriptions. We have copperplate inscriptions from this period, and manuscripts were traditionally made of palm leaves. On Pallava and Cōla epigraphy, see T. N. Subramaniam, ed., South Indian Temple Inscriptions, 3 vols., Madras Government Oriental Series no. 157 (Madras: Government Oriental Manuscript Library, 1955–1957).

²⁴ On the Pallavas and Colas as patrons of bhakti, see Mahalingam, Kāñcipuram, and K. A. Nilakanta Sastri, The Colas, 2nd ed., rev., 2 vols. in 1 (Madras: University of Madras, 1955).

was now identical with the sacred-cultural map outlined by the early saints through their pilgrimages.²⁵

The Têvāram saints and their hymns had a lasting impact on the temple, the center of Tamil bhakti culture. The Cōla kings enlarged and rebuilt extant Siva shrines and built great structural temples in stone, particularly in the places visited by the Nāyaṇārs, now called pāṭal peṛra talam, "a place sung by the saints." The prefix tiru- (sacred, auspicious; from Sanskrit śrī, "auspicious") was added to the names of the shrines visited by the Nāyaṇārs: thus Ārūr became Tiru-v-ārūr, and Aiyāru, Tiru-v-aiyāru. The Cōlas also perpetuated the institution, begun by the Pallava kings before them, of employing singers to sing the hymns of the Nāyaṇārs during ritual worship in the temples; similar endowments were made and continued by private citizens. The exquisite Cōla temple bronzes and stone sculptures of this period closely reflect the devotional spirit and imagery of the Tēvāram in their depiction of the mythology of Siva. (See illustration section.) The Nāyaṇārs themselves became a part of the iconography and ritual complex of the temple.

Both temple iconography and the inscriptions of the Cola period reflect a well-established cult of the veneration of the saints in the Tamil Śaiva tradition. Sixty-two of these Nāyaṇārs—including Appar and Campantar—were first named together in a Tēvāram hymn of Cuntarar, called "List of the Holy Devotees" (Tirut toṇṭat tokai); the final list of the "Sixty-three" (Arupattumūvar), whose lives are narrated in the definitive twelfth-century hagiography of Cēkkiļār,29 includes Cuntarar himself.

²⁵ On the significance of the Tēvāram shrines and the saints' pilgrimages in Tamil Śaivism, see Indira V. Peterson, "Singing of a Place: Pilgrimage as Metaphor and Motif in the Tēvāram Hymns of the Tamil Śaivite Saints," Journal of the American Oriental Society 102, no. 1 (January-March, 1982): 69–90.

²⁶ Tiru- is also prefixed to names of persons, objects, and texts associated with the bhakti God: e.g., Tiru-nāvukkaracar (a name of the saint Appar), Tirut tonṭar purāṇam (Cēkkilār's Lives of the Holy Devotees). For information on the Cōla temples associated with the Tēvāram hymns, see S. R. Balasubrahmanyam, Early Chola Temples (Delhi: Orient Longman, 1971); idem, Middle Chola Temples (Delhi: Thomson Press, 1975); and idem, Later Chola Temples (Delhi: Mudgala Trust, 1979).

²³ Consult the inscriptions cited in Dorai Rangaswamy, Religion and Philosophy, 1: 18, 22-24; Nilakanta Sastri, Colas, pp. 6, 555, 637-38, 642; and Balasubrahmanyam, Early

Chola, Middle Chola, and Later Chola Temples, passim.

²⁸ For developments in the iconography of Śiva in Cōla times, consult Douglas E. Barrett, Early Cola Architecture and Sculpture, 866–1014 (London: Faber, 1974), and Balasubrahmanyam, Early Chola, Middle Chola, and Later Chola Temples. Dorai Rangaswamy, Religion and Philosophy, Bk. 2, ofters a detailed discussion of the image of Śiva in Cuntarar's hymns and the iconography of the Pallava temple of Kailāsanātha in Kanchipuram. On the iconography of the saints, see Balasubrahmanyam, op. cit. Events connected with the lives of the saints are ritually commemorated in Tamil Śiva temples.

27 The Periya puranam (Great Story) or Tirut tontar puranam (Story of the Holy Devotees,.

Eventually, the three Tēvāram poets were honored as the "First Three Saints" (mūvar mutalikal) of the Tamil Śaiva sect. In yet another configuration, the three poets, along with the later (ninth century?) saint Māṇikkavācakar, the author of the Tiruvācakam ("Sacred Utterances"), are known as the "Preceptors of the Faith" (camayakuravar) or simply, "the Four" (nālvar).

Two centuries separate Cuntarar from Appar and Campantar; all three poets speak of saints who lived before them. Yet the tradition saw fit to unite the three saints in the concept of the "First Three Saints"—pioneers and leaders, gifted poets who shared a common sensibility and vision. In the eleventh century the hymns of these three poets were compiled in seven volumes, later to be collectively designated the "Tirumurai" ("Sacred Tradition," "Sacred Text"), and revered as the primary scripture (marai) of the Tamil Śaiva sect. Though the collective title "Tēvāram" ("a text related to ritual worship"?) was given relatively late (the sixteenth century?) to the Nāyaṇārs' hymns, Tamil Śaivas have always looked upon them as a single "text." 31

The story of the canonization of the Tēvāram is told in a fourteenth-century work, the Tirumuraikanta purāṇam (The Story of the Discovery of the Tirumurai). According to the Purāṇam, the eleventh-century Cōla king "Apayakulacēkaraņ" asked the poet Nampi Āṇṭār Nampi of Nāraiyūr to reveal the hymns and lives of the Śaiva saints to the world. Guided by the deity Gaṇeśa (son of Śiva and god of Beginnings), Nampi discovered the Tēvāram hymns in manuscript form, half-eaten by white ants, in a sealed room near the golden hall of the great Śiva temple in Chidambaram. Having compiled these hymns of Appar, Cuntarar, and Campantar into seven books (Books I–VII of the Tirumurai), Nampi set out to recover the lost musical tradition of the songs. The scholar finally managed to reconstruct the melodic and rhythmic aspects of the hymns

³⁰ Cuntarar himself declares: "(I saw the Lord) who loves the hymns in which I repeat / all that melodious Ñāṇacampantaṇ / and Nāvukkaracar, King of Speech, / have sung of him in their good Tamil songs" ("nallicai ñāṇacampantaṇu nāviṇukkaracarum pāṭiya naṛṛamilmālai colliyavē colliy ēṭtukappāṇai . . . ," (Tēvāram VII.67.5; Poem 261).

³¹ "(Tiru)murai" corresponds to the Sanskrit term āgama, "(sacred) tradition." Zvelebil (Tamil Literature, 1975, p. 134) points out that "the term (tiru) murai, meaning (holy) book," is rather late, occurring "for the first time in Cēkkiļār's Periya purānam (ca. 1135 A.D.) . . . and in the inscriptions of the age of Kulottunga III (1178–1218)."

³² A work attributed to the fourteenth-century Saiva teacher Umāpati Civam, this narrative can be found in editions of the Periya purāṇam. The dating of the second half of the Purāṇam, which deals with the compilation of Books VIII–XI of the canon, appears to be later than Nampi. See the discussion in Zvelebil, Tamil Literature, 1975, pp. 134–35.

³³ Identifying "Apayakulacēkaran" as Kulottunga III (A.D. 1070-1122), Zvelebil, Tamil Literature, 1975, p. 134 places Nampi Ānţār Nampi in the period A.D. 1080-1100.

with the help of a female descendant of the musician who had accompanied Campantar on his travels.

The story of the "discovery" of the Tēvāram hymns in written form and the reconstruction of their ancient musical modes (pan) suggest that prior to the eleventh century there may have been a break in the oral tradition through which the Tēvāram hymns were transmitted.³⁴ The recovery legend itself may have been molded in its present form in order to serve symbolic as well as practical purposes: it establishes the authenticity of the Tēvāram hymns as "revealed" scripture, attested by miraculous communications from Ganeśa and by Śiva himself;³⁵ it suggests that the poetic output of the early saints had been of greater magnitude than what is actually available to us;³⁶ and it celebrates the role of the Cōla monarch as the great patron of Śaivism, and of Chidambaram (designated simply as "The Temple" [kōyil] in later editions of the hymns), as the greatest center of Śaivism.³⁷

The seven books of the Tēvāram, also known as the "Complete Canon" (aṭaṅkaṇmuṇai), form the bulk of the primary sacred texts of Tamil Śaivism. Though Nampi Āṇṭār Nampi could not have been the editor of the remaining five books of the Tirumuṇai, it is most likely that the compilation of the entire canon took place between the eleventh and thirteenth centuries.³⁸ Books VIII–XI of the Tirumuṇai are made up of ¹⁴ The later oral and musical tradition is discussed in detail in Chapter 4 below.

[&]quot;According to the Tirunuraikanta puranam, at the king's request that the lost hymns of the saints be recovered, Nampi Āṇṭār Nampi worshipped his chosen deity, Gaṇapati or Gaṇesa in his persona of Pollāppillaiyār of Tirunāraiyūr. The deity revealed the location of the hymns—the sealed room in Chidambaram temple—to Nampi. Upon further prayers from Nampi, Gaṇapati revealed the termite-eaten manuscripts to the king and the scholar. Later, a heavenly voice (Śiva himself?) commanded Nampi to learn the tunes of the hymns.

¹⁶ It is said that termites had eaten a large number of hymns and that the hymns compiled by Nampi consisted only of the remaining hymns. Fabulous figures are quoted for the actual output of the saints. At least in the case of Cuntarar, it is quite likely that his hundred hymns (a nice, round figure) represent only part of his composition. The legend of enormous numbers of writings being lost and subsequently recovered, but only in part, is a recurrent motif in the Tamil literary tradition, the most famous of such accounts being the legend of the three classical cankams or academies, from whose literary works only a portion is said to have survived great floods or tidal waves. A detailed analysis of the "Cankam" legend may be found in Zvelebil, Tamil Literature, 1975, pp. 55–61. A closer parallel (in particulars and in time period) to the Saiva legend is the legend of the Tamil Vaiṣṇava ācārya (teacher) Nāthamuni's recovery of the entire collections of the 4,000 hymns of the Āļvārs. See the account in Ramanujan, Hymns, p. xini, and Zvelebil, Tamil Literature, 1975, pp. 152–55.

On the rise of Chidambaram as the center of Tamil Saivism, see B. Natarajan, The City of the Cosmic Dance: Chidambaram, Southern Art Series 2 (Delhi: Orient Longman, 1974).

¹⁸ Cf. the arguments in Dorai Rangaswamy, Religion and Philosophy, 1: 20–21. For a list of the works contained in the twelve Tirumurai texts, see Zvelebil, Smile of Murugan, pp. 188–89, and for short accounts of these works, see Zvelebil, Tamil Literature, 1975, pp. 134–38, 142–51.

hymns (Books VIII, IX, and XI); the Tirumantiram, a mystical-philosophical text (Book X); and hagiographical poems (Book XI).39 The canon was completed in the twelfth century, with the composition and grand, public canonization of the Periva puranam (The Great Story), Cekkilar's narrative of the lives of the sixty-three Navanars, as the twelfth book of the Tirumurai. 40 For Tamil Saivism the age following the Periva puranam was characterized by the rise of matams and atinams, great centers of sectarian learning and administration.⁴¹ The sectarian leaders and teachers who were attached to these religious centers were typically ascetics who came from both brahmin and Vellala (a high-ranking peasant caste) backgrounds; between the thirteenth and sixteenth centuries they produced the large body of primary texts and commentaries in Tamil that makes up the literature of the Saiva Siddhanta, the philosophical system of the Tamil Saiva sect. Though the Siddhanta philosophy has definite connections with the philosophy of other Saiva sects such as the Pāsupatas and Kashmir Saivas, 42 the particular form of doctrine expounded in the fourteen treatises of the "lineage of teachers" (cantānācāriyārkal) is unique to Tamil Saivism. 43 According to the Saiva Siddhanta there are three ultimate reals: pacu (Sanskrit pasu, the individual soul), pati (the Lord, Siva), and pācam (Sanskrit pāsa, fetter, the bondage of karma). Through a fourfold, four-stage hierarchical path of "devotion"—of acts of service, worship, spiritual discipline, and ultimate knowledge, acti-

39 The poems of Nampi Āṇṭār Nampi on the lives of Appar and Campantar are included in Tirumurai XI.

⁴⁰ The dramatic narrative of the canonization of Cêkkilār's hagiographical poem is told in the Cēkkilārnāyaṇār purāṇam. Zvelebil, Tamil Literature, 1975, pp. 178–81, provides a summary.

⁴¹ On the early history of sectarian matams (Sanskrit matha) in the Tamil area, see Nilakanta Sastri, Development of Religion, pp. 117–18. The Tamil Saiva matams at Tiruvottiyūr and Tiruvavatuturai have a very ancient history and probably date at least from the time of the Nayanars.

⁴² On the early Śaiva sects, often collectively referred to as the "Pāśupata" sects, see R. G. Bhandarkar, Vaiṣṇavism, Śaivism and Minor Religious Systems (Strasbourg: Karl J. Trübner, 1913), pp. 115–19. Although the many "Pāśupata" sects differed in practice, they seem to have shared in common the doctrine of the three categories of paśu, pati, and pāśa. Like Śaiva Siddhānta, the philosophy of Kashmir Śaivism is closely related to the Āgamas: see J. C. Chatterji, Kashmir Shaivism (Srinagar, 1914). On the Kāpālikas, see David N. Lorenzen, The Kāpālikas and Kālāmukhas: Two Lost Śaivite Sects (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1972).

⁴³ On Śaiva Siddhānta philosophy and theology, see: V. A. Devasenapathy, Śaiva Siddhānta (Madras: University of Madras, 1958); Mariasusai Dhavamony, Love of God according to Śaiva Siddhānta: A Study in the Mysticism and Theology of Śaivism (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1971); and K. Sivaraman, Śaivism in Philosophical Perspective: A Study of the Formative Concepts, Problems and Methods of Śaiva Siddhānta (Delhi: Motilal Banarsidass, 1983). The first two authors deal with Śaiva Siddhānta as expounded in the

Tamil canon; Sivaraman uses a number of sources in Sanskrit.

vated at each stage by the Lord's grace (arul)—the soul is liberated from bondage.

Devotion is at the center of Tamil Śaiva religion, as the focus of the Ägamas and worship at the Śiva temple, as the theme of the songs and lives of the saints, and as the basis of the Siddhānta philosophy. Devotion, expressed in act and attitude, continues to be the most important religious activity for Tamil Śaivas; and these devotees continue to hold that the symbolism and meanings of devotion are best realized though the hymns of the saints. Among the canonical texts of Tamil Śaivism the average Tamil Śaiva is likely to know well only three: the Tēvāram, Māṇikkavā-cakar's Tiruvācakam, and the Periya purāṇam, all connected with the devotional spirit of the early "leaders" (Nāyaṇmār), each beloved for the special and unique way in which it articulates that spirit. Chapter 3 and 4 study the particular ways in which the Tēvāram functions as a "textbook" of Tamil Śaiva devotion.

The Poets and Their Poems

The Three Saints

The dates of the three $T\bar{e}v\bar{a}ram$ poets and the factual details of their lives continue to be a matter of controversy. It appears most likely that the lives of Appar and Campantar overlapped, and that they lived between A.D. 570 and 670. The most plausible date for Cuntarar is the end of the seventh and the beginning of the eighth centuries. Quite apart from considerations of factual accuracy, for Tamil Saivas Cēkkiļār's Periya purāṇam hagiography is the most authoritative account of the lives of the sixty-three Nāyaṇārs. In this brief summary of the lives of the $T\bar{e}v\bar{a}ram$ saints, I have followed Cēkkiļār's narrative.

Appar was born Maruṇīkkiyār, a Śaiva Vellala, in the town of Tiruvāmūr. In his youth he converted to Jainism, took the name Tarumacēṇar (Sanskrit "Dharmasena"), and became the head of a Jain monastery in Tiruppātirippuliyūr. Afflicted by painful abdominal disease, the Jain monk turned to his sister Tilakavatiyār, a devout Śaiva, for help. She convinced him to put his faith in Śiva. Tarumacēṇar appealed to Śiva, was miraculously cured, and underwent a dramatic conversion. He poured out his devotion to his Lord in melodious Tamil hymns. Angered by the poet's devotion to Śiva, the Jains persecuted and tortured him, but he emerged unscathed from all his trials and succeeded in reconverting the ¹ The question of the dates and relative chronology of the Tēvāram poets is discussed in Zvelebil, Tamil Literature, 1975, pp. 138–44, and by F. Gros in his Introduction to Gopal Iyer, ed., Tēvāram, vol. I, pp. xl-xlvi. According to Zvelebil's account, Campantar's mention of the Pallava general Ciruttonṭar, who destroyed the Chalukya capital of Vātāpi in A.D. 642, gives us some idea of his date. Appar is presumed to have been a contemporary of the Pallava king Mahendravarman I (A.D. 580–630) and is placed between 570 and 677. Cuntarar is seen as a contemporary of the Pallava king Narasimhavarman II (A.D. 690–710?).

² Without, of course, claiming factual and historical accuracy for this hagiographical narrative. In its blend of fact, legend, and archetypal motifs, Cêkkilar's work is typical of Hindu narratives of saints' lives.

Pallava king to Śaivism. Hailed as a saint, he spent his long life (of over eighty years) traveling from one Śiva shrine to another in Tamil countryside, singing hymns in each sacred place. In iconography, the saint is often portrayed holding the hoe (ulavārap paṭai; see illus. 1 and 3) with which he cleared the temple courtyards of weeds and grass—an image appropriate both for the Tamil Śaiva ideal of humble service (tonṭu) and the Vellala farmer's attachment to the land. The saint's eloquence earned him the name Tirunāvukkaracar ("King of Speech," Sanskrit vāgīśa), but he is popularly known as Appar, a name he acquired because the young Campantar is said to have affectionately addressed him as appar ("my father").

Campantar (pronounced SAMBAN'DAR), whose popular name is a shortened version of Nanacampantar or Tiruñanacampantar ("He who is related to the Lord through [divine] wisdom"), was a child prodigy who began composing hymns when he was "barely weaned." Born a brahmin in Cirkali, a coastal town near Chidambaram on the mouth of the Kaveri, Campantar is said to have mastered Vedic learning by age three, when he miraculously received the gift of sacred poetry from Siva himself. From then on, the child-saint embarked on a career of incredible religious activity. Accompanied by crowds of fellow devotees, Campantar made four great pilgrimages to the Siva shrines in the Tamil region. At every shrine he composed melodious Tamil hymns in various complex meters and rhythms. A Pānar musician called Tirunīlakantayālppāņar accompanied Campantar on his journeys and set his hymns to pan tunes. The many stories of the miraculous powers of Campantar's hymns suggest that the poet's followers must have written down his songs soon after he had spontaneously sung them at the shrines.4 In the iconography, Sampantar is a child, sometimes holding the golden cymbals (tāļam) that Šiva himself gave him to keep his tender hands from getting sore while keeping time (tāla) to the hymns (see illus. 1 and 2; in the latter he holds the divine cup of wisdom).

Campantar himself speaks of having defeated Buddhist and Jain monks in debate and having reconverted the Pandyan king of Maturai (Madurai) to Saivism. The life of this saint who is credited with many miracles had

³ Campantar refers to himself thus in Tēvāram III.297.1 ("pāṇal vāy oru pālaṇ"; Poem 228). The great Vedanta philosopher and pan-Hindu religious leader Śaṅkara (eighth century?) refers to Campantar as the "Tamil child" (drāvidašisu) in one of his hymns (Saundaryalaharī 76).

In hymn III.345 (Poem 231), Campantar refers to manuscripts when he speaks of the praises of Siva that emerge undurt when they are cast into the flames. According to the hagiographical tradition, this hymn alludes to Campantar's triumph over the Jains who challenged him to cast the name of his god into fire and thus prove the name's indestructibility. See Part Two, Section 4 below.

an appropriately miraculous ending. Campantar's parents had arranged the marriage of their adolescent son to take place in Tirunallürpperumaṇam. At the time of the wedding, however, Siva appeared as a great blaze of light and invited the saint to join him. The gracious deity included the bride and the entire wedding company in Campantar's final union with God.

Nampi Ārūrar or Cuntaramūrtti, affectionately called Cuntarar (pronounced Sun'darar; "the Handsome One") by Tamil Saivas, was born a Śaiva brahmin in Tirunāvalūr on the river Pennai. On Cuntarar's wedding day, Siva appeared at the assembly and claimed him as his devotee and bondservant. The saint received Siva's grace in Tiruvenneynallūr. Cuntarar lived mainly in the great Saiva center of Tiruvārūr (hence the name Nampi Ārūrar, "Prince of Ārūr"), but like the other saints, made pilgrimages and composed hymns at various shrines. His hymns are full of autobiographical material, especially in connection with his marriages to the temple dancer Paravai in Tiruvārūr and the Vellala woman Çankili in Tiruvorriyūr. The saint mentions kings and local chieftains as his friends and benefactors, the Cera king Ceraman Perumal and the Pallava feudatory Naracińka Munaiyaraiyan among them. Cuntarar is said to have ascended to heaven on a white elephant, accompanied by his friend, the Cera king. The contrast between Guntarar's life and personality and those of the other two Tēvāram authors is brought out in the iconography, where he is depicted as a handsome, well-dressed, princely young man, often in the company of his wives (see illus. 1 and 4).

The Text

Like other terms connected with the hymns of the Nāyaṇārs, the word tēvāram is of obscure etymology and was applied quite late to the first seven books of the Tirumurai. Citing the use of the word in Pallava and Cōla inscriptions, Dorai Rangaswamy argues that the word originally connoted "private ritual worship" and eventually came to be applied to the early hymns because of their many associations with temple worship. The significance of the term cannot be fully understood, however, without reference to its musical and devotional associations in the Cilappati-

s See the discussion in Dorai Rangaswamy, Religion and Philosophy, 1: 27–35. Somasundaram, Tirujñāṇasambandhar, p. 12, rightly notes that the so-called earliest use of the term tēvāram for the hymns of the three saints—in the Ēkāmparanātar ulā of the fourteenth-century poet Iraṭṭaiyar—is in reality a continuation of the older usage, "private worship." The first unambiguous application of the term to the corpus of hymns as we know them is in the Aruṇaikkalampakam of a later poet, Caiva Ellappa Nāvalar, who refers to the "beautiful sacred hymns of the Tēvāram and Tiruvācakam [of the three poets and Māṇikkavācakar]."

kāram epic. Veļļaivāraņan and others rightly point out that tēvāram must be related to the word vāram, which is used in the sense of "a song addressed to a deity" in this classical poem.⁶

The Tevaram corpus consists of 796 hymns composed by Sampantar, Appar, and Cuntarar,7 The 383 hymns of Campantar are contained in the first three books of the Tirumurai, Appar's 313 songs constitute Books IV-VI, and the seventh book consists of the 100 hymns of Guntarar. The many terms by which the poets themselves refer to their songs relate to different aspects of these hymns: structure, as in the term pattu (decad, ten verses); musicality, as in patțu (song); and connections with the Tamil language and literature, as in tamil pattu (ten verses in Tamil). Patikam (verse, poem, song, from Sanskrit padya, verse) is the word that has been consistently used to denote the hymns throughout their history.8 The individual hymn has ten or eleven verses. The verses are four-line stanzas with a refrain.9 The last verse in Campantar's and Cuntarar's patikams forms a coda or signature verse, in which the poet includes his name and speaks about himself, the nature of his song, and the benefits of singing or listening to it.10 Though Appar does not include his name in the final verse of his hymns, he uses the myth of the demon-devotee Ravana as his unique closure motif and "signature." A similar thematic pattern distinguishes Campantar's hymns from those of the other Nayanars: he devotes the eighth, ninth, and tenth verses of his patikams, respectively, to the myth of Rāvaņa, that of Śiva as the cosmic linga, and to the denunciation of the Jains and Buddhists.

The language of the Tevaram hymns is considerably different from that

The number goes up to 797 with the inclusion of a recently discovered hymn (attributed to Campantar) inscribed on the wall of the temple at Tiru-vițaivăy in Thanjavur (Tanjore) district.

Some of Campantar's hymns have complex stanzaic patterns that deviate from the four-line model. Aspects of poetic form in the Tēvāram hymns are discussed in Chapter 5 below.

⁶ Vāram and tēvapāņi songs are mentioned severai times in the Arankērrukātai of the Cılappatikāram; the reference of particular interest to us is in lines 136–37, "vāram iraņţum varicaiyir pāṭap / pāṭiya vārattu īrrin ninricaikkum." See the discussion in Vellaivāranan, Pannīru tirumurai varalāru, pp. 35–43, and Somasundaram, Tirujñānasambandhar, ch. 1.

In the early inscriptions that record endowments for the singing of the hymns in temples, the Nāyaṇārs' songs are called tiruppatiyam (sacred song). The most likely origin for the term is the Sanskrit padya (poem). Less plausible are the poular etymologies that derive patikam from Sanskrit pathika (traveler), hence "pilgrim song," and from Tamil pattu (ten), hence patikam, "a poem of ten stanzas." See Dorai Rangaswamy, Religion and Philosophy, 1: 15–18. See below for further discussion of the association of the hymns with the Tamil language.

¹⁰ Such coda verses, called phalastuti, are also a standard feature of classical sacred texts and devotional works in Sanskrit. The final verse in Campantar's poems is called tirukkataikkāppu ("the final sacred protection" or "sacred closure"); this was also the name applied to Campantar's hymns themselves. See Dorai Rangaswamy, Religion and Philosophy, 1: 31.

of the poems of the Cankam classical age and is in many ways closer to the literary Tamil of later centuries. The form of the hymns is also new to Tamil poetry. The Tamil Śaiva hymns are "true" songs, in contrast to the classical poems, which appear to have been recited as well as sung, as indicated by akaval ("to call, recite"), the name of the principal meter of the classical poetry, and by the classification of bards into musicians ($p\bar{a}nar$, etc.) and nonmusicians (e.g., akavunar). The Nāyanārs combined the basic metrical patterns of Tamil verse with prosodic principles largely new to Tamil poetry, creating a large number of new "musical" meters, as well as a new song form, the patikam, with its ten stanzas and refrain, eminently suited to the spirit and themes of the new religion of bhakti.

Several features of the $T\bar{e}v\bar{a}ram$ tradition draw attention to the musical nature of the patikams. The traditional arrangement of the hymns in manuscripts and printed editions is the panmurai, or "arrangement according to the musical modes." The hymns were set to music in 23 of the 103 pan scale-types of ancient Tamil music, and were once sung to the accompaniment of the ancient Tamil stringed instrument, now extinct, known as the $y\bar{a}l$. Though the ancient tunes have not survived, the musical dimension of the hymns plays an important role in the Tamil Saiva apprehension of them; it is also the key to a clear understanding of their metrical and rhythmic aspects. Since at least the eleventh century the oral tradition of the professional singers of the hymns in the temples has been the principal means for the preservation and transmission of the saints' poems as songs. ¹³

Themes and Strategies

In bhakti hymns, the inner state of the "I" of the poems becomes prominent for the first time in Indian religious poetry. 14 Yet the expression of the personal relationship between God and self is only one of the concerns

11 See K. Kailasapathy's discussion of the akaval meter in classical Tamil poetry, in Tamil Heroic Poetry (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1968), pp. 110-11. On the many types of bards, singers, and performers in classical Tamil civilization, see Hart, Poems, ch. 6.

12 The legend of Campantar's musician-companion suggests that, like the Cankam poets, the Tēvāram saints were accompanied by pāṇar musicians. One of Campantar's hymns is called "yāl-murippaṇ" ("a tune which is beyond the capacity of the yāl"). The yāl-which is now extinct—and aspects of ancient Tamil music are described in the epic Cilappatikāram. On the yāl, see Swami Vipulānanda Cuvāmikal, Yālnūl: A Treatise on Ancient Tamil Music (Tanjore: Karantai Tamil Sangam, 1974). See Appendix B below for a list of the twenty-three paṇ scale-types used in the Tēvāram. For further detail on the subdivision of these paṇs according to the rhythmic structure of the hymns, see Vellaivāraṇaṇ, Paṇṇiru tīrumurai varalāru, pp. 453-552.

¹³ See my discussion of ōtuvār performances, Chapter 4 below.

¹⁴ See the discussion in Zvelebil, Smile of Murugan, pp. 199-202.

of the early Tamil saints. Their hymns are poems of praise as well as love. celebrations of cult and community as well as God. The themes of the hymns are closely connected with ritual and communal worship at the temple. The poets saw their songs as formal "offerings of song" or "garlands of verse" (pāmālai, nāmālai) offered in place of "garlands of flowers" (pūmālai),15 which formed part of the ritual milieu of the temple. In venerating the songs as sacred texts and officially incorporating the Tevāram into the temple ritual, Tamil Śaiva tradition only affirms this view. The hymns are public poems in other ways as well. Appar, Guntarar, and Campantar address some hymns to Siva, some to themselves, others to their fellow devotees; many poems assume the Tamil Saiva community as witness. 16 The poets paint an affectionate portrait of Tamil Saiva religion, which is expressly designed to move the hearts of the listeners to greater devotion to Siva. The many poetic images of Siva and the descriptions of the settings of devotion, exemplary devotees, and devotional acts all serve this end.

THE NAMES OF THE LORD: THE HYMNS AS POEMS OF PRAISE

As composers of songs praising God, the Nāyaṇārs were working within two separate traditions of praise poetry, one arising from indigenous Tamil cultural roots and the other from the brahmanical cultic heritage of Saiva religion. The saints' adoption of the classical Tamil genre of the poet or bard's praise of his king is no mere literary borrowing but gives insight into the very nature of God and the bhakti relationship as conceived in early Tamil Śaivism. Reserving the discussion of this aspect of the poems to the detailed consideration of the Tamil cultural contexts of the Tēvāram below, let us turn first to the Sanskritic heritage of the hymns.

The poems of the Nāyaṇār Kāraikkāl Ammaiyār (A.D. fifth century?) are the earliest examples we have of Tamil hymns exclusively addressed to Śiva.¹⁷ In the Tamil literature that preceded the Tēvāram authors, Śiva has no "indigenous" persona comparable to Viṣṇu as Māyōṇ, the pastoral god of the late classical Tamil poems, who is a blend of features from to On varieties of rhetorical structure in Tamil bhakti hymns, see Cutler, Songs of Experience, ch. 1. Cutler points out that even poems that are framed as interior monologues may have a public dimension.

¹⁵ The poets, and others after them, refer to the hymns by these words. See also Appar IV.103.3 (Poem 213), in which he refers to the hymn as "the ornament (paţimakkalam) of Tamil song."

[&]quot;See Karavelane, ed. and trans., Chants dévotionnels tamouls de Kāraikkālammaiyār, Publications de l'Institut français d'indologie, no. 1, new edition (Pondicherry, 1982).

indigenous and Sanskritic religion. ¹⁸ In terms of subject matter and some formal characteristics, as well as in terms of their function as sacred utterances in a ritual context, the patikams are closely associated with early Sankrit stotra ("praise poem") hymns. The primary function of the Vedic hymns, the earliest religious literature in Sanskrit, is praise of the gods in the context of the sacrificial ritual. ¹⁹ Many features of the Vedic hymns are carried over into the early Sanskrit stotras that are addressed to the gods of the classical pantheon and found in longer sacred texts such as the Bhagavadgītā and other portions of the epic Mahābhārata, as well as in "secular" poems by court poets such as Kālidāsa (A.D. fourth century) and Bhāravi (sixth century). ²⁰ In their simplest form these hymns are catalogues of the names, epithets, and attributes of the deity. ²¹ Tēvāram verses such as this one by Campantar have many stylistic affinities with the early Sanskrit litanies:

My heart can think of nothing other than the brahmin who is the Veda, he who bears the white moon on his pure, matted red hair, God who is both man and woman, the Supreme Lord who dwells in the beautiful shrine of holy Ekampam in Kacci.

Campantar II.148.1 (Poem 15)

Such phrases as "who bears the white moon / on his pure, matted red hair" in Campantar's verse are counterparts to the compound epithets in Sanskrit hymns. The parallelism of grammatical endings in the phrases describing Siva in the Tamil verse (maraiyānai mācilāp puncaṭai malkuveṇpiraiyānai . . .) is also a standard feature of the Sanskrit stotra and gives a sonorous regularity to the hymn. Many of Appar's hymns in the ¹⁸ On the Tamil cult of Māyon-Visnu, see Hardy, Viraha-Bhakti.

¹⁹ See Zvelebil's discussion of the Vedic hymns in relation to Tamil bhakti hymns: Zvelebil, Smile of Murugan, pp. 201ff.

²⁰ E.g., the praise of the Goddess (Durgā), Mahābhārata, Book 4, ch. 6; Bhagavadgītā XI.36ff.; the hymn to Viṣṇu in Kālidāsa's Raghuvaṃsa X.16ff.; the hymn to Śiva in Bhāravi's Kirātārjunīya XVIII.22—43.

²¹ E.g., the Viṣṇusahasranāma-stotra ("Hymn of the Thousand Names of Viṣṇu") in the Mahābhārata: "He who is of the form of the Universe and is all-Pervasive, who is of the form of Sacrifice. . . . The Terrible, the Multi-headed, the Tawny One." In the translation of V. Raghavan, The Indian Heritage: An Anthology of Sanskrit Literature (Bangalore: Indian Institute of World Culture, 1956), pp. 422-24. On the magical power of sacred names, see Jan Gonda, On Names and the Name of God in Ancient India, Verhandelingen der Koningklijke Nederlandse Åkademie van Wetenschappen, Letterkunde, Nieuwe Reeks, vol. 75, no. 4 (Amsterdam, 1970).

long tānṭakam meter, which make up the sixth book of the Tirumurai, are cast in this paratactic framework; Appar VI.301.1 ("vāṇavaṇ kāṇ"; "See the god! / See him who is higher than the gods!"; Poem 20), which I have analyzed in detail below in relation to the performance of the saints' hymns, is a good example of the type.

Within the Saiva tradition, one Sanskrit stotra stands out as the most influential model for the Tēvāram hymns: this is the Śatarudrīya ("The hundred names of Rudra") hymn in the Yajur Veda.²² This ancient litany is addressed to Rudra-Śiva, the Vedic prototype of the classical Śiva Mahādeva. It enumerates the hundred names and epithets of the god, describing him, praising his deeds, and invoking his grace in verses such as these:

Obeisance to the primal cause, salutation to Rudra (that melts misery), . . . salutations to the blue-throated and the white-necked, supplication to the wearer of the kaparda locks [matted hair], . . . homage to the mountain-lord . . .

and

Oh! Rudra! make us happy here and grant bliss hereafter. To you that diminishes our sins we offer our respects. With your goodwill we shall enjoy the happiness and the negation of misery vouchsafed to us by our father prajapati Manu.²³

There are a number of reasons for citing the Śatarudrīya as the most likely source of inspiration for the patikam as "stotra." In the first place, the Śatarudrīya is the most complete early catalogue of the names, deeds, and attributes of Śiva; the later stotras to Śiva are but classical elaborations of the imagery of this hymn. 24 Second, this litany has had a very important role in Saiva ritual in both the Vedic and the Āgamic traditions, whence the likelihood of the hymn being a direct influence on the Nāyaṇārs. The Śatarudrīya or "Rudram" is the principal Vedic text used to accompany important Āgamic temple rites and, in particular, the abhi-

²² On the Śatarudrīya, see C. Sivaramamurti, Śatarudrīya: Vibhūti of Śiva's Iconography (Delhi: Abhinav, 1976); J. Gonda, "The Śatarudrīya," in Sanskrit and Indian Studies: Essays in Honor of Daniel H. H. Ingalls, ed. M. Nagatomi, B. K. Matilal, J. M. Masson, and E. C. Dimock, Jr. (Dordrecht: D. Reidel, 1980), pp. 75–91; and J. Bruce Long, "Rudra as an Embodiment of Divine Ambivalence in the Śatarudrīya Stotram," in Experiencing Śiva, ed. Clothey and Long, pp. 103–28. Of the two recensions of this hymn, the text as it occurs in the Taituriya Samhitā of the Black (kṛṣṇa) Yajurveda is used in South India; see Sivaramamurti for the text and translation.

Sivaramamurti, Satarudrīya, pp. 21, 28.
 Ibid., and Gonda, "Satarudrīya."

seka (bathing/anointing) ritual for the image of the deity in the temple.²⁵ When the saints speak of the tradition of Vedic chant and Sanskrit sacred formulae (mantra) being used in the temple ritual of their times, the reference is surely to the Śatarudrīya, which continues to be the most important Sanskrit text used in major temple festivals and processions as well as in the daily rites.²⁶ Lastly, the Śatarudrīya is of particular significance to Tamil Śaivas, since it is in this text that the five-syllable sacred formula (pañcākṣara-mantra) "namaḥ śivāya" (Hail Śiva!), the supreme sacred formula (mantra) in Tamil Śaiva doctrine, appears for the first time.²⁷

Seeing Śiva: Image and Vision in the Hymns

The catalogue of Siva's attributes is only one of the many forms the Tevāram hymns take; the images of Siva in the saints' hymns are more expansive, detailed, and stylized than those evoked by the phrases in the stotra literature. Appar, Campantar, and Cuntarar were innovative poets who molded elements of the classical poetry of both Sanskrit and Tamil to create a sophisticated literary genre as well as a new kind of religious expression. Again, it is convenient to look at the Sanskritic context of the hymns at this point. It is in the areas of subject matter, certain formal characteristics, and autonomy of content that the patikam verse resembles the descriptive verses that are typical of Sanskrit kāvya court poetry. Like the kāvva stanza, in four short lines the Tēvāram verse often presents a suggestive, sharply defined descriptive vignette, which, though it is part of a sequence of ten or eleven verses, can be understood and enjoyed in isolation.²⁸ And yet, despite so many similarities, the intent and the effect of description in the Tamil Saiva hymns are quite different from that in Sanskrit court poetry, especially in its later manifestations.

Śiva's appearance and his mythic deeds are favorite subjects for description in the Tēvāram; in the saints' hymns we find poetic counterparts for the many iconographic depictions of Śiva that we find in Śiva temples. The images and myths of Śiva and Viṣṇu are also popular subjects with Sanskrit court poets who, like the Tamil saints, lived in a bhakti culture in which the gods, temples, and image worship were emphasized.²⁹ The

²⁵ Consult Gonda, "Śatarudrīya," and Long, "Rudra," for a description of the use of this hymn in Śaiva ritual.

²⁶ Personal observation in Tamilnadu.

²⁷ In the eighth Anuvāka of the Taittirīya version. See Sivaramamurti, "Śatarudrīya," p. 1, and Long, "Rudra," p. 106.

²⁸ For an introduction to the kāvya stanza and Sanskrit court poetry and poetics, see Daniel H. H. Ingalls, An Anthology of Sanskrit Court Poetry: Vidyākara's Subhāṣitaratna-koṣa, Harvard Oriental Series, vol. 44 (Cambridge Harvard University Press, 1965).

²⁹ Ibid., introd., and translation sections 1-6.

earliest iconographic descriptions of Śiva in kāvya poetry are found in the court epics and plays of the fourth-century poet Kālidāsa and reflect a vision harmonious with that of the Tēvāram poets. The majority of such verses in Sanskrit poetry are later than the Tamil hymns, however, which suggests the possibility of the influence of the Tamil hymns and hymnists on Sanskrit poets even outside the sphere of explicitly "devotional" literature. The contrast between these Sanskrit poems and the Tamil stanzas reveals the particularity of the vision of Siva in Tamil bhakti. It is instructive to compare the treatment of the popular theme of the dance of Siva in a Tēvāram verse and a Sanskrit poem dating from the seventh century or later, composed by a poet from a different region in India.

May the god of tangled locks protect you, at whose dance of madness in the fullmoon twilight the golden mountain sways with leaping woods, as sway the sun and moon, to the rhythmic motion; as if the earth, of head resplendent, with hair and earrings flying, did nod in admiration.

Sanskrit poem from an eleventh-century anthology; trans. D.H.H. Ingalls³²

The point of the Sanskrit verse is the "image" (alaṃkāra: trope, figure of speech, conceit) of the earth nodding in admiration at Śiva's dance, an image that must be appreciated through the gradual comprehension of each of the iconographic comparisons made in the poem—head: the golden mountain (Mount Meru, at the center of the universe); flying hair: leaping woods; flying earrings: the sun and the moon. The religious conception of Śiva forms the basis and enriches the meaning of the poem; yet the cleverness of the conceit is more central to the aesthetic of the stanza than the "religious" idea on which the figure of speech is based, namely, the cosmic nature and power of Śiva's dance. This is quite in keeping with the purpose of Sanskrit court poetry, which was to offer intellectual and aesthetic stimulation to an audience of connoisseurs of poetry.³³

³⁰ See in particular the invocatory verses to Kālidāsa's three plays, and the Kumārasaṃ-bhava, an epic poem on the marriage of Śiva and the Goddess Pārvatī in Barbara Stoler Miller, ed. and trans., Theater of Memory: The Plays of Kālidāsa (New York: Columbia University Press, 1984); and The Origin of the Young God: Kālidāsa's Kumārasaṃbhava, translated, with annotation and an introduction, by Hank Heifetz (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1985). See also Barbara Stoler Miller, "Kālidāsa's Verbal Icon: Aṣṭāmūrti Śiva," in Discourses on Siva, ed. Michael W. Meister (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1984).

³² Most of the kātya stanzas describing the Hindu gods in an "iconographic" mode in the (eleventh century) Subhāsstaratnakosa, an early anthology, date from the seventh and eighth century or later. See Ingalls, Anthology.

¹² Subhāsitaratnakosa 52, in Ingalls, Anthology, p. 79.

³³ Ingails, Anthology, introd. Also see the discussion in Edwin Gerow, A Glossary of In-

When our Lord who is both end and beginning dances to the deep sound of the mulavam drum, holding blazing fire in the hollow of his hand, as the mountain's daughter watches, the Gangā's murmuring stream with foaming waves flows over the cool crescent moon. He who smears his body with ash from the burning-ground is our Lord who dwells in Vēṭkaļam's fine town.

Campantar I.39.1 (Poem 30)

In contrast to the Sanskrit poet, Campantar presents an image of Śiva's dance that, though rich in iconographic and sensory detail, is devoid of fanciful figures of speech and poetic conceits. The iconography of the poem is thoroughly realistic, for it corresponds in every respect with specific sculptural conceptions of Śiva's dance. The poem is meant to conjure up a precise "icon," a concrete image, of Śiva in the hearer's mind. When the Tamil Śaiva poet wishes to describe Śiva as the god who bears the moon on his crown, he says simply: "crowned with the pure white crescent moon," or "who bears the white moon on his pure, matted red hair," or "crowned with the white moon / bright as beaten silver leaf. . . ."³⁴ The conceits that are commonplace in Sanskrit court poetry, such as the poetic fancy that the moon looks "as if it were a sprout that grew / under the daily waterings of Ganges / from out the white skull of his diadem," and that "the new moon like a minnow / dives and surfaces" in the river Ganges that flows through Śiva's matted hair, are alien to the bhakti hymns.

In the final analysis, neither iconographic accuracy nor simplicity of expression is an end in itself for the poet-saint. What matters is that all description be framed in the perspective of the devotional vision, which renders these Tamil poems different from both kinds of Sanskrit poetry with which they are allied. Tamil bhakti requires that God be perceived—by poet and reader or listener—through the lens of passionate love, personal involvement. In most Tēvāram hymns the bhakti point of view bedian Figures of Speech (The Hague: Mouton, 1971), pp. 70-74. According to Gerow (p. 72), the aim of the Sanskrit poet is "a richness of intelligibility which is at first overwhelming."

³⁴ "Tūveņ mati cūṭi" (Campantar I.1.1; Poem 183); "mācilāp puņcaṭai malkuveņ piṛaiyāṇai" (Campantar II.148.1; Poem 15); and "vellit takaṭaṇṇa veṇpiṛai cūṭi" (Appar IV.113.1; Poem 2).

¹⁵ Ingalls, Anthology, p. 78.

³⁶ Ibid. Other themes that invite comparison between the Sanskrit and Tamil verses: the description of Siva as the cosmic linga (e.g., Ingalls, Anthology, no. 48), and the descriptions of Siva's head and hair (Ingalls, Anthology, nos. 40, 53, 55).

comes an integral part of the content of the poem. As an illustration, let us consider a verse by Campantar that begins with what appears to be a straightforward iconographic description of Siva:

He wears a woman's earring on one ear; riding on his bull, crowned with the pure white crescent moon, his body smeared with ash from the burning-ground, he is the thief who stole my heart....

Campantar I.1.1 (Poem 183)

The description of Siva as androgyne (Ardhanārīśvara) and bull rider proceeds in what might be called a purely "objective" manner almost to the end of the second line of the stanza, where the phrase "the thief who stole my heart" ("eṇṇ uḷḷaṅ kavar kaḷvaṇ") occurs, altering our perception of the foregoing images of Siva. Everything about the god—his androgynous form, the bull on which he rides—becomes beautiful, attractive, enchanting, in an intimate, emotional sense, because he is conceived of as the artful lover who has seduced the saint. "Thief who stole my heart" is a common expression in Tamil, "indicating the speaker's fond, teasing, love relationship with the "thief"; it also belongs to the conventions of classical Tamil love poetry, as illustrated in a poem in the Kuzuntokai anthology. The poem, in which a woman speaks of her clandestine love-making with a man who might betray her in the future, begins:

Only the thief was there, no one else. And if he should lie, what can I do?³⁸

It is not enough to note that Campantar suggestively uses the allusion to human sexual love and to conventions in classical Tamil love poetry in his description of Śiva; if this were all, the Tēvāram verse would be no different from many Sanskrit poems that use erotic imagery in contexts of devotion.³⁹ The crucial difference in the Tamil bhakti poem is that whatever effect the phrase in question might have on readers in terms of a purely literary aesthetic—be it in the Sanskrit or Tamil tradition—their surest and deepest response is to what they perceive as the saint's personal and genuine love for Siva, the sincerity of his emotion as indicated by the poetic phrase. What makes the bhakti poem valuable and effective is the projection, in various ways, of what the audience sees as the saint's own personal feeling and experience onto his descriptions of God and of devotion itself. Look at Appar's description of Siva's dance:

³⁷ As also in Sanskrit and other Indian languages. It is an expression frequently used to describe Krishna, the butter-thief and archetypal lover in Hindu mythology.

³⁶ Kapilar, Kuruntokai 25, translated by A. K. Ramanujan, The Interior Landscape: Love Poems from a Classical Tamil Anthology (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1967; Midland edition, 1975), p. 30.

³⁹ Ingalls, Anthology, pp. 21ff., discusses a Sanskrit poem in which the poet uses erotic imagery in conjunction with the Saiva myth of the three cities of the demons.

If you could see the arch of his brow,
the budding smile
on lips red as the kovvai fruit, cool matted hair,
the milk-white ash on coral skin,
and the sweet golden foot raised up in dance,
then even human birth on this wide earth would become a thing worth having.

Appar IV.81.4 (Poem 29)

In this verse subjective adjectives such as "sweet golden foot" (both "sweet" [inittam utaiya] and "golden" [pon-] are terms of endearment in Tamil) color the descriptive portion of the verse, so that the conclusion-"then even human birth on this wide earth / would become a thing worth having"—rings true, impressing the reader with the force of personal conviction. Such personal nuances are foreign to the aims and aesthetic of kāvya poetry, which is essentially an impersonal aesthetic focusing on the interplay of language and imagery. 40 Although personal emotions and stances may be portrayed in Tamil love poetry (e.g., affective words like "sweet" and "thief" do appear in the dramatic monologues of the classical poems), they do not correspond to the feelings of any real person.⁴¹ Impossible in both the Sanskrit and the Tamil classical traditions are poems such as the verse in which, abandoning all "realistic" description, the poet speaks of Siva in purely subjective terms, calling him "the gorgeous gem, delicious honey, milk, / the sweet taste of sugar cane, clear sugar syrup, / precious gem, the sound / of flute, drum, cymbals, and lute, ..." (Appar VI.243.1; Poem 25). The aesthetic of description in the Tevāram is an aesthetic of personal experience and feeling. 42

The Tamil Saiva poet aims at "imaging" Siva, in the sense of directly presenting an intimate and specific experience of his Lord, a task that steers him away from using such "poetic" intermediaries as wit, paradox, or complex figure, which might distance the reader from the bhakti experience. The saints sought to move their listeners to devotion and protested, like George Herbert, against all "fictions" that intervene: "Must all be veiled, while he that reads, divines, / Catching the sense at two removes?"43 The poets of the Tamil hymns seek to help their fellow devotces to see (kān-) Siva, to approach him (nannu-, nātu-, anuku-, cēr-), and to melt in love for him (uruku-, neku-/nekku-, kaci-).44 Their description of Siva focuses on visual images and the act of seeing. Vision (Sanskrit daršana) is of paramount importance in establishing intimate contact or communion with the divine in Hinduism, and finds its fullest expression in the traditions of image and temple worship, which are fundamental contexts of bhakti in Tamil Saivism. 45 The poet-saint acts as the "seeing eye,"46 recording the vision or image of Siva for readers "to see" for themselves. Undistracted by "quaint words and trim invention," by thoughts that "burnish, sprout, and swell, / Curling with metaphors a plain intention, / Decking the sense as if it were to sell," the reader finds in the poet's love "a sweetness ready penned," 47 which melts his heart to love. Generations of Tamil Saivas have acknowledged that this is the primary function of bhakti poetry. Mānikkavācakar's Tiruvācakam is prized for its affective qualities; the Tamil belief that it has the power to move all but the stoniest hearts is embodied in the popular saying, "No words can move him who does not melt upon hearing the Tiruvācakam" ("tiruvācakattirku urukātār oru vācakattirkum urukār").

⁴⁰ On the impersonality of kāvya poetry, see Ingalls, Anthology, pp. 22-27.

⁴¹ On the use of "dramatis personae" in Cankam love poetry, see Ramanujan, Interior Landscape, pp. 112–15.

⁴² Ramanujan (Hymns, p. 162) speaks of bhakti poetics as a "new poetics" of "personal feeling whether aesthetic or not." See his discussion, Hymns, pp. 161–64.

The Tamil saints find many meanings in the myth that narrates how Viṣṇu and Brahmā arrogantly declared their superiority over Śiva and then were humbled by their failure to perceive Śiva's cosmic form as the flame-linga in its entirety. One interpretation of this myth is that none but those who love God can see him, and only through his grace can they obtain a vision of him. It follows, then, that only those who love Śiva can, having seen him, describe him. In the Tamil Śaiva view, an "objective" description of Śiva is meaningless; the only true image of God is that which is seen in the poet-devotee's loving eye.

⁴³ George Herbert, "Jordan (1)," in Seventeenth-Century Prose and Poetry, ed. Alexander M. Witherspoon and Frank J. Warnke (New York: Harcourt Brace and World, 1929; 2nd ed. 1963), p. 849.

⁴⁴ E.g., Appar VI.301.1 (Poem 20): "See the god! / see him who is higher than the gods!" and Campantar III.307.1 (Poem 144): "those who melt with love / and flow with tears as they chant (his name)" The notion of "melting" is central to the devotion and poetry of Māṇikkāvacakar. See Yocum, Dancing Śiva, pp. 168–73.

⁴⁵ For an excellent exposition of the idea of "seeing the divine" (darsana) in Hinduism, see Diana Eck, Darsan: Seeing the Divine Image in India (Chambersburg, Pa.: Anima, 1981), esp. ch. 1.

⁴⁶ Appar speaks of Śiva himself as the devotee's "eye" (kan): Appar VI.229 (Poem 28), Karukāvūr Tirut tānţakam.

^{4&}quot; Herbert, "Jordan (2)," in Seventeenth Century Prose, ed. Witherspoon and Warnke, p. 854.

THE TAMIL ROOTS OF THE Tevaram

According to the canons of Cankam literature, poetry was classified into two basic categories, "interior" (akam) and "exterior" (puram), corresponding to the classification of human experience itself. With their closely interwoven themes of ceremonial praise and intimate love, the Tamil Saiva songs do not belong strictly to either of the classical genres. Nevertheless, the majority of the poems have greater affinities to the puram (public) rather than to the akam (interior) genre. A number of factors account for this, all ultimately stemming from key ideas in Tamil civilization.

Of the two kinds of poetry, akam poems, which are love poems, deal with "idealized types, rather than historical persons," and landscape types rather than specific places. In contrast to this impersonal, interior poetry, "puram, the so-called 'public poetry,' is allowed names, places, expression of personal circumstances in a real society, a real history, and freedom from the necessities of poetic convention both in ullurai (implicit metaphor) and in the landscapes. Thus it is the 'public' puram poetry that becomes the vehicle of personal expression and celebration of historical personages." As poets expressing personal sentiment, praising a real God who manifests himself in particular places, and celebrating a particular community, the Tēvāram saints are heir to the puram tradition.

LOCAL HERO: SOME Puram THEMES IN THE Tevaram

The mode of royal praise in the saints' hymns was not simply grafted onto a religious genre but was a natural development from ideas about kingship and the sacred in the classical civilization. The Nāyaṇārs' model for the image of Śiva was the Tamil "king" or local ruler, who was considered to be "the central embodiment of the sacred powers that had to be present under control for the proper functioning of society." The cult of temple worship in Tamil country after the Cankam age shows clear evidence of the transference of the idea of the king with sacred power to the deity in the temple. 2 As George Hart points out, "words that meant

⁴⁸ See Ramanujan, Interior Landscape, Afterword, for an introduction to the poetics of akam and puram in classical Tamil poetry.

⁴⁹ Ibid., p. 104.

⁵⁰ A. K. Ramanujan, "Form in Classical Tamil Poetry," in Symposium on Dravidian Civilization, ed. Andrée F. Sjoberg, publication no. 1, Asian Series, Center for Asian Studies, University of Texas at Austin, general editors: Edgar C. Polomé et al. (Austin and New York: Jenkins, 1971), p. 97.

⁵¹ Hart, Poems, p. 13.

⁵² Discussed in the following essays: Hardy, "Ideology and Cultural Contexts"; George L. Hart III, "The Nature of Tamil Devotion," in Aryan and Non-Aryan in India, ed. Madhav M. Deshpande and Peter E. Hook, Michigan Papers on South and Southeast Asia, no.

king in ancient Tamil now denote God. For example, iraivan ('he who is highest') used to mean king but is now generally applied to the supreme deity, while köyil ('king's house' or 'palace') now means temple."53 Certainly, the Tevaram poets address Siva most often by such words as ko. kömän, perumän, iraivan (king, ruler), nampi (prince), and īcan, pirān, empiran (our lord, master). The king is only one of the persons and objects in which sacred power manifests itself for the Tamils. Particular places—landscapes, natural phenomena, human settlements—can themselves be loci of the sacred. The "divinities" of the ancient Tamils were indwellers of such sacred places.⁵⁴ Again, the bhakti cult of sacred places is an extension of this idea of sacred loci, for the shrine or town where Siva manifests himself is such a place.55 The simplest formula for the refrain in the Tevaram hymns is a phrase identifying Siva as a "god of the place," the "dweller" or "lord" of a particular shrine, for instance, "anņāmalaiyār" (Lord of Annāmalai) in Campantar I.69 (Poem 80). Šiva is the "king" who dwells in Annamalai, Palanam, and other Tamil places. Appar, Campantar, and Cuntarar are bards who praise him, asking him for grace, even as the Cankam poet would praise his lord, hoping to be rewarded with gold and gifts.⁵⁶ In order to fit into the indigenous conception of the divine, Siva had to become a local hero, an indweller of particular places.

In puram war poems, the poets sing of the heroic deeds and exploits of their kings. The Nāyaṇārs, too, speak of the mythic deeds of Śiva in heroic terms, merging his cosmic persona with his local identity, as in this verse in which Śiva who destroyed the three cities (tripura) of the demons—in a well-known myth of great antiquity—is identified as the local lord of the hill-shrine of Aṇṇāmalai:

The Lord of the gods, the spouse of beautiful Umā, he who once bent his bow of war

^{14 (}Ann Arbor, Michigan: Center for South and Southeast Asian Studies, 1979), pp. 11-33; and A. K. Ramanujan and Norman Cutler, "From Classicism to Bhakti," in Essays on Gupta Culture, ed. Bardwell L. Smith (Columbia, Mo.: South Asia Books, 1983), pp. 177-94.

⁵³ Hart, Poems, p. 13.

⁵⁴ Rajam Ramamurti offers a new formulation for the idea of localization: "a site was so independent of the divinity—... that it could precede or survive their presence." Rajam Ramamurti, "On the Themes of Divine Immanence and Localization," Tamil Civilization, Quarterly Research Journal of the Tamil University, Thanjavur (September 1983): 73–76.

⁵⁵ See Yocum, "Shrines, Shamanism."

³⁶ Cuntarar asks Siva himself for gold: Tēvāram VII.46 (Poem 256). See my discussion of this motif in Indira V. Peterson, "In Praise of the Lord: The Image of the Royal Patron in the Songs of Saint Cüntaramürtti and the Composer Tyāgarāja," in Patronage in Indian Culture, ed. Barbara Stoler Miller (Princeton: Princeton University Press, forthcoming).

to set fire to the three cities, is the Lord of Annāmalai, on whose slopes waterfalls bring large pearls and gems gathered in forest tracts by gypsy hunters with long bows.

Campantar I.69.5 (Poem 80)

The process of localization is taken a step further in the mythology of the "Eight Heroic Deeds." According to the Tamil Śaiva tradition, like the battles of the Tamil kings, Śiva's cosmic acts of destruction, such as the destruction of the three cities and the burning of the Love-god (Kāma), were actually performed in the Tamil countryside, especially in the Kaveri Delta region. Eight myths are designated the Eight Heroic Deeds, and the places where these deeds took place are collectively known as Aṭṭavīraṭṭāṇam, "the shrines of the Eight Heroic Deeds." The eight myths and the Vīraṭṭāṇam shrines have a prominent place in the Tē-vāram.⁵⁷

Involving Siva in the origin myths of his shrines is another strategy adopted by the Tamil Saivas to make him their own god.58 For instance, the Nayanars allude in their hymns to the claims of several temples of having been the sole survivors of the great cosmic flood because Siva manifested himself at that shrine to save it at the time of the flood.59 The Tamil country also became the locale for Siva's wanderings as a beggar, riding on his bull, and the stage for his many dances. The local and regional flavor of the poems is further enhanced through the frequent references to events in the poets' own lives and devotional careers as well as those in the lives of other Tamil devotees, both historical and legendary, some of whom were contemporaries of the Tēvāram saints. Such allusions are interwoven with descriptions of exemplary Saiva devotees who appear in the Sanskrit epics and Puranas. Thus the stories of the well-known Tamil saints Kannappar and Canticar may be juxtaposed in a verse or hymn with the Sanskrit epic myths of the austerities with which Arjuna and Bhagīratha propitiated Śiva. In all these ways Śiva Mahādēva ("the great god") manifests himself in the Tēvāram as a true hero of puram poetry, a local chief ruling over particular Tamil towns and landscapes, performing acts of heroism and largesse to protect and favor his Tamil "subjects" and being praised by his devoted bards, the Tēvāram saints themselves.

⁵⁷ The term "Vīraṭṭāṇam" is added to the names of these towns, beginning with (Tiruv-) Atikai Vīraṭṭāṇam. For a list of the eight shrines and the myths associated with them, consult Appendix C.

³⁸ Such myths were elaborated in the Tamil talapurānam (local myth, myths of the place) genre from the sixteenth century on. See Shulman, Tamil Temple Myths.

¹⁹ See, e.g., Campantar I.75.2 (Poem 54), Campantar I.53.4 (Poem 107), Campantar I.131.9 (Poem 108), and Campantar III.376 (Poem 109).

TAMIL LANDSCAPES, TAMIL LOVE

Bhakti connotes not only "devotion," in the sense of reverence, attachment, and loyalty, but "love" (Tamil anpu, kātal) in all its dimensions. The Siva of the Tamil hymns is not just an awesome, transcendent, brahmanical deity and the manifestation of sacred power on the Tamil model; he and his devotees are bound to each other by a powerful mutual love. The intimate nature of this relationship comes across in the many images and terms of endearment with which the saints address their God: "my pearl," "my honey," "my treasure." Even while picturing Siva as king and master, the Nayanar sees him as related to his devotees by the closest and most significant kinship ties in the Tamil family: the Lord is the devotees' father (attan, appan, tantai), mother's brother (māman, ammān), even mother (tay, ammai). Poems in which the Lord is portrayed as the lover are rare in the Tēvāram, although there is an undercurrent of erotic mysticism in many poems in which the saint laments his separation (viraha) from God. Whatever the kind of love the saint wishes to portray, he draws on the tradition of the classical Tamil akam poetic genre, which constitutes the literature of the interior, the literature of all intimate love relationships.

The most striking feature of akam poetry is its system of landscapes. 60 The tradition classifies love between man and woman into five phases (uri), each of which is associated with, and takes place in, a particular landscape type in the Tamil region. In the classical poems, landscape elements suggest and symbolize aspects of human love: for instance, the kuriñci (hill) landscape relates to lovers' union; mullai (forest), to patient waiting and domesticity. Landscape forms an important, though not essential, part of the descriptive repertoire of the Tamil saints. In many patikams Campantar and Cuntarar self-consciously use akam landscape conventions in a way that brings out both the affinities and the differences between akam and bhakti poetry. Let us compare a Cankam love poem with a verse of Campantar, in which similar landscape elements are used:

WHAT SHE SAID
Once: if an owl hooted on the hill,
if a male ape leaped and loped

60 See Ramanujan, Interior Landscape, pp. 105-12, for a concise introduction to the idea of landscape in Tamil poetry. A more detailed account can be found in A. K. Ramanujan, Poems of Love and War: From the Eight Anthologies and the Ten Long Poems of Classical Tamil (New York: Columbia University Press, 1985).

out there on the jackfruit bough in our yard my poor heart would melt for fear. But now in the difficult dark of night nothing can stay its wandering on the long sloping mountain-ways of his coming.

Kapilar, Kuruntokai 153; trans. A. K. Ramanujan⁶¹

Tiruvaiyāru is the place where the female ape, in fright leaps up on a branch to look for rainclouds, taking for thunder the roll of drums when women dance, going around the shrine where the Lord dwells who delivers us from fear when the five senses wander out of their cages, and cease to function, the phlegm rises, the reason fails, and we are afraid.

Campantar I,130.1 (Poem 76)

In the classical poem we overhear the interior monologue of a speaker who is identified as the "heroine." The situation or phase of love is lovers' union, a topic associated with the hill landscape (kuriñci). The theme of this particular poem is the emotional landscape that surrounds the maturing of a young girl through her love for her man, a hero who comes from the hill country. The suggestive use of images and features conventionally appropriate to the mountain landscape—the owl hooting on the hill, the ape on the jackfruit tree, night, the hero's mountain path-is the principal means by which the meanings of the poem are brought to the reader. The suggestions are multiple; for instance, not only is the noisy male ape in the heroine's yard an obstacle to the clandestine meeting of the lovers in the heroine's own home at night, he is a counterpart of the hero himself, symbolizing him as the strong but somewhat insensitive man who initiates the innocent virgin into a world of powerful sexuality.62 The process of the "virgin's progress from abstraction to experience"63 is made vivid to the reader through the phenomenon of "'Inscapes' . . . of the natural scene" repeating "the total action of the poem."64

Turning to Campantar's verse, we see that the Tēvāram poet does not

⁶¹ Ramanujan, Interior Landscape, p. 64.

⁶² Hart, Poems, p. 167, cites another classical poem where the image of the male ape is used in a similar manner.

⁶¹ Ramanujan, Interior Landscape, p. 109.

⁶⁴ Ibid., pp. 109-10.

strictly adhere to the classical conventions of time, place, and voice, or of landscape elements. The town of Tiruvaiyāru, situated in the Kaveri Delta region, is not in a mountain-landscape setting, of which the ape is a "native element." The rainy season is properly associated with the mullai or "patient waiting" phase of love. The verse itself is not an interior monologue; the poet-persona is speaking to an implied audience, his fellow devotees. Lastly, the shrine of Siva and the ritual activities of the devotees are as important for the affective impact of the poem as the landscape elements. However, the two poems are also similar in important respects: the natural description in both poems is firmly grounded in reality;65 landscape is used in both to suggest emotional states; and in both cases the emotions evoked are fear and love.

The function of the imagery in the classical love poem is "to arouse the complex interplay of suggestions."66 Like Kapilar (the author of the akam poem), Campantar, too, uses the descriptive elements of his verse in suggestive ways. The female ape who leaps up "in fright" is implicitly compared to the mind of the devotee, which is confused and gripped by fear (of karma and rebirth) at the moment of death.67 The ape is skillfully integrated into the temple scene by the device of the animal's mistaking the sound of drums for thunder. The description of the dancing devotees naturally leads to mention of the temple and the deity who dwells within, the god who delivers the devotee from fear when his mind, like the monkey, leaps about in ignorance and uncertainty. Yet the suggestions in the Tevaram verse are not "bottomless."68 This poem has a "solution," its diverse images unambiguously converge on a point: the image of Siva as the god who delivers his devotees from fear. The classical poem is clean and spare in design; yet, while no explicit comparisons are made, every aspect of the landscape is linked to the heroine's interior state in suggestive relationships of increasing complexity. In Campantar's poem, on the other hand, the links that lead the reader to progressive awareness of the comparison between the natural and inner "scenes" are presented in a linear manner, leading to the clarity of the total effect.

From the point of view of classical Tamil poetics, Campantar's poem would be an inferior example of the use of suggestion in poetry. However, from the bhakti point of view, his verse is highly successful, if only for the fact that it felicitously brings together several aspects of Tamil bhakti religion—the interior and exterior aspects of the devotional relationship, ⁶⁵ On realism in classical Tamil poetry, see Ramanujan, "Form in Classical Tamil Poetry," p. 91.

⁴⁶ Hart, Poems, p. 196.

⁶⁷ The conception of the mind as a monkey is a common one in the Tamil tradition.

⁶⁸ In contrast to the Cankam poems, which, George Hart suggests, have suggested meanings that cannot be "tied down; there is no one correct solution" (Hart, Poems, p. 163).

Siva as local god and transcendent deity—in the emotional setting of classical Tamil poetry. And that, indeed, is the saint's primary concern. The conventions of akam love poetry were more directly relevant to Tamil Vaiṣṇava bhakti lyricism, which focused on the classic lover-god Viṣṇu-Krishna, and some of the Vaiṣṇava Ālvārs used the akam tradition with greater versatility and depth than the Nāyaṇārs. Appar, Campantar, and Cuntarar use the akam world primarily as an instrument and context with which to evoke the Tamil cultural past in a very general way, through association and allusion. The purpose of this evocation is to establish the link between landscape and love that is essential to the Tamil world view.

In one aspect of landscape description the Nāyaṇārs are in harmony with both akam and puram poets. The lush beauty and abundance of the agricultural landscape of the banks of the Kaveri and of the many hills and wooded regions of the Tamil countryside are both a characteristic of the akam and puram traditions, where the bard evokes the richness of his hero's lands by means of natural description, 70 and an observable fact for the population of the Kaveri region. The Tamil Saiva cult was born, and flourished in, the Kaveri Delta, the richest rice-growing region in Tamil country. The focus on the lore and landscape of the legendary river Kaveri had a particularly strong appeal for the Cōla rulers and the peasantry of this area:71

Let us sing the feet of the tridentbearer, the Lord who dances with ringing anklets, and loves his abode where his loving devotees praise him, Kāṭṭuppaḷḷi on the Kaveri who rushes down in many gurgling streams, washing sandal- and aloe wood with soft sounds onto her banks.

Campantar I.5.4 (Poem 75)

^{6°} The Vaiṣṇava saint Nammāļvār devoted 270 verses in the Tiruvāymoli and the whole of his Tiruviruttam to akam themes. The woman Āļvār Āṇṭāļ wrote two important poems in the genre of women's songs involving akam themes: the Tiruppāvai and Nācciyār tirumoli. Among the Śaiva poets, Māṇikkavācakar stands out for his successful use of akam themes in the Tirukkōvaiyār.

⁷⁰ See, for instance, the poet Kapilar's poem on the legendary Cankam chieftain and patron Pāri: Puranānūru 109, in Ramanujan, Love and War, pp. 142-43.

⁷¹ The ancestral myths of the Cōlas connected them to the Kaveri River and its delta region, particularly in the area covered by the present day Tanjore (or Thanjavur) district. The first part of the epic Cilappatikāram, set in the Cōla realm, contains an ode to the Kaveri.

In such descriptions, Appar, Campantar, and Cuntarar at once express their own deep love of this land and strike a sympathetic chord in their audience. Poet, God, king, and community are united by their love for the Tamil countryside.

SIVA AS TAMIL GOD

The three Tēvāram poets express a self-conscious love of the Tamil language and poetry. They refer to their hymns as Tamil songs in a number of expressions: tiruneriya tamil ("sacred Tamil"), tamil mālai ("garland of Tamil verse"), tamil pattu ("Tamil decad"), "tamil" ("Tamil, a literary work in the Tamil language"). Campantar speaks of the tunes of their hymns as "Tamil musical modes" (pan), and Appar laments: "[I have] never failed to sing you in melodious Tamil songs" ("tamilōticai pāṭal marantariyen," IV.1.6; Poem 234). In this respect, the Tamil saints represent an ancient tradition in which the Tamil language is seen as the very manifestation of "sweetness, pleasantness and correctness,"72 In effect, they also affirm the sacrality of the Tamil language and pan music by identifying both with Siva. Their Siva is a chanter of the musical (Sama) Veda, and a lover of music. He loves to listen to the songs of his devotees: "He listens, and takes delight in their songs" (II.42.4). The Lord is himself an expert singer of pan music ("panniyal pātalinān," I.108.6); a fine player on the lutelike vīnā ("icai vīnai pūņar," 1.279.6; "vīņai tān avar karuviyo" VII.33.5); and a connoisseur of all the arts ("celunar kalai terintavar," 111.338.4). Finally, Siva is art itself; he is the Tamil language and pan music. Cuntarar calls Siva "the seven notes of music, / the fruit of my song" ("ēlicaiyāy icaippayanāy," VII.51.10; Poem 249). Campantar sings of the Lord who is "the pans, the seven notes of music, and the many sounds of the Tamil language" ("pannum patam ēlum palavocait tamil avaiyum," I.11.4), and Appar sees Siva as "Sanskrit of the North and southern Tamil and the four Vedas" ("vatamoliyun tenramilu maraika nānkum," VI.301.1; Poem 20). The last reference is representative, and is significant for the way in which it juxtaposes the Vedas and the Sanskrit language with Tamil. With the religion of the Vedas and Purānas the Tamils accepted the ideas of Sanskrit as the sacred tongue and the Vedas as śruti, "revealed" scripture. Appar and his fellow poets gave the Tamil language, and hymns in Tamil as well as Tamil music, equal status with the sacred "northern" language and its scriptures. These are only some of the ways in which the saints proclaim their own and their God's special love for the Tamil cultural heritage, the language and literature of which

² Zvelebil, Tamil Literature, 1975, p. 53. Tamil refers not only to the language but to literature in Tamil, classified into "three types" (muttamil): iyal (verse and prose, meant for recitation's icai (musical composition, song); and nāṭakam (drama).

continue to be the most powerful symbol of cultural identity for the Tamils.⁷³

With the evocation of the Tamil tongue the Tēvāram poet-saints complete for their readers and listeners the portrait of a religion of love that is quintessentially Tamil in character: love of a Tamil king-hero-god whose presence and acts are "placed" in beloved Tamil landscapes, love expressed through the images and animated with the spirit of a treasured classical literature, and love that is articulated in the language that symbolizes and connotes all of the above.

RITUAL, SERVICE, AND LOVE: PORTRAIT OF A COMMUNITY

ATIYAR: THE COMMUNITY OF SERVANTS

We are slaves to no man, nor do we fear Death.
Hell holds no torments for us,
we know no deceit.
We rejoice, we are strangers to disease,
we bow to none.
Joy alone is ours, not sorrow,
for we belong forever
to Śańkara, who is the supreme Lord, our King who wears the white conch earring on one ear, and we have reached his beautiful, flower-fresh feet.
Appar VI.312.1 (Poem 240)

Although many hymns of the three Tēvāram poets bear the imprint of the author's unique personality, attitudes, and experience, especially in the verses that directly deal with the intimate aspects of his relationship with Siva, we also hear a strong collective voice. The emotional stances and themes in the poetry of the three saints are remarkably similar and are expressed in shared vocabulary and imagery. The hymns are products of the individual saint's personality and experience interacting with a shared Tamil Śaiva vision of devotion to Śiva. Once again, the communal dimension of Tamil Śaiva bhakti comes to the fore; saint and community come together in the ideal of the "the devotee."

⁷³ The Dravida Munnerrak Kalakam, a modern political party whose platform is a separate ethnic-national identity for the Tamils, sees the Tamil language and its unique literary and cultural heritage as the foundation of this identity. The stare formerly known as Madras has been renamed "Tamilnadu" (land of the Tamils). On contemporary Tamil political-cultural movements, see Robert L. Hardgrave, Jr., The Dravidian Movement (Bombay, 1965).

In the vocabulary of the Tēvāram, and of later Tamil Śaivism, the devotee is an aṭiyār, a servant; literally, "one who is at the feet." To the saints, their fellow devotees are nantamar, namar ("our people"), or simply nām ("we"), as in the well-known verse of Appar quoted above. At one level, the Nāyaṇārs included all worshippers of Śiva in "the community of devotees" (aṭiyār kūṭṭam): not only people who exclusively adhered to Tamil Śaiva cultic practice but also members of other Śaiva sects, even the Kāpālikas and "Viratis, men of bizarre appearance, who wear garlands of skulls," whose extreme ritual and ascetic practices were abhorrent to the followers of bhakti religion. At a more specific level, especially in the affectionate references and addresses of the poet-saints to their fellow devotees, the term aṭiyār seems to denote only those who worshipped and served Śiva in the new mode of passionate, emotional devotion.

ACTS OF LOVE

The conception of the ideal aţiyār must be understood in the context of the totality of acts and attitudes that the Tēvāram poets consider "devotional." In the Nāyaṇārs' hymns, devotees express devotional feeling in spontaneous, unstructured ways that are characteristic of emotional bhakti:

O devotees who have joined our group out of love, dance, weep, worship him, sing his feet, gather at Kurankāṭuturai, place of our Lord! Appar V.177.8 (Poem 204)

However, the devotees also engage in structured, ceremonial acts, acts of ritual worship:

Kaṭavūr Vīraṭṭam's Lord is like sweet sugar cane to those who become the madman's devotees, who rise at dawn to bathe, to gather fresh flowers,
and lovingly offer them in worship, lighting lamps and burning incense for the rite.

Appar IV.31.4 (Poem 86)

⁷⁴ Appar IV.21.1 (Poem 98).

The activities described in this verse are part of " $p\bar{u}j\bar{a}$," the ritual mode of worshipping and honoring divine images and personages in Hinduism. Though ritual was the core of the Vedic religion, image worship was not part of it, and the emphasis was not on the relationship between deity and worshipper but on the proper performance of ritual itself, the sacrifice being seen as "the principal manifestation of reality." The $p\bar{u}j\bar{a}$ ritual combines many non-Vedic ideas with a similar emphasis on ritual purity and the power of ritual. In the South Indian temple, $p\bar{u}j\bar{a}$ is performed by priests according to Agamic prescriptions. The devotees in the Nāyaṇārs' hymns support temple ritual and perform private and communal $p\bar{u}j\bar{a}$ rites that are open to all.

The Nāyanārs are well aware that ritual, by its very definition, holds the possibility of degenerating into mechanical piety, devoid of the emotion and spontaneity that is the essence of bhakti religion. Yet they view acts of ritual worship as an essential expression of emotional bhakti. When we consider the associations of sacred power and beauty that Siva's concrete manifestations and his abodes hold for Tamil Saivas, it is not surprising that acts of ritual offering and service which take place in these contexts are invested with great emotional and aesthetic significance. The Nāyanārs' conception of ritual is itself derived only in part from the brahmanical legacy of Tamil Śaivism; it has popular, communal, and ecstatic dimensions that have their roots in indigenous Tamil religion, perhaps in such customs as the communal dances in which men and women celebrated the Tamil god Murukan and were possessed by him. 78 Certainly, in the early Tirumāl and Murukan bhakti texts, devotees are depicted as practicing an ecstatic and communal devotionalism focused on pilgrimage, worship at particular shrines, and ritual.79 In the religion of the Nā-

⁷⁵ On the pūjā ritual, in addition to Eck, Daršan, see Joanne P. Waghorne and Norman Cutler, in association with Vasudha Narayanan, eds., Gods of Flesh, Gods of Stone: The Embodiment of Divinity in India (Chambersburg, Pa.: Anima, 1985). See especially Paul B. Courtright's "On This Holy Day in My Humble Way: Aspects of Pūjā," pp. 33–50, and Vasudha Narayanan's essay on the image of God in Śrīvaiṣṇava theology: "Arcāvatāra: On Earth as He Is in Heaven," pp. 53–66.

⁷⁶ Hopkins, Hindu Religious Tradition, p. 21. On the Vedic ideal of ritual, see ibid., ch.

⁷⁷ On pājā in the South Indian Śiva temple, see J.W.V. Curtis, "Space Concepts and Worship Environment in Śaiva Siddhānta," in Experiencing Śiva, ed. Clothey and Long, pp. 87–101.

⁷⁸ Ecstatic dancing, shamanism, and sacrifice are described in classical works such as the Tirumurukārruppaṭai and Cilappaṭikāram. For details, see Hardy, Viraha-Bhakti, pp. 131–42, 230–31, and app. 7.

⁷⁹ Paripātal 19 contains a fine, detailed description of a Pāntiya pilgrimage from Maturai to Tirupparankunram. The Tirumurukārruppatai, as its title indicates, is a "guide to Murukan," a guide for pilgrims who wish to visit the god in his shrines in the Tamil region.

yanārs, ritual is also a personal and sensuous mode of experiencing the beauty and glory of God:

Hands, join in worship, strew fragrant flowers on the Lord who binds the hooded snake around his waist! Hands, join in worship!

Of what use is the body that never walked around the temple of Siva. offering him flowers in the worship rite? Of what use is this body? Appar IV.9.7, 8 (Poem 197)

For Appar, Campantar, and Cuntarar, ritual is beautiful. It is an important component of bhakti as aesthetic experience. Ritual is an essential means for expressing one's love for the Lord; it can be as emotionally charged as dancing or singing. Lastly, it consists of acts of offering and service, the ideal way of life for the true devotee.

RITUAL AND SERVICE IN THE LIVES OF THE SAINTS

In the Nāyaṇārs' depiction of the ideals for devotees and devotion we get a vivid image of the paradox inherent in early Tamil devotion. In addition to ritual worship, the poet-saints celebrated and cherished many aspects of traditional religion and culture associated with the brahmin elite and the aristocracy. Campantar describes himself as the "Kayuniyan" (a Tamil brahmin of the Kaundinya gotra, 1.8.11), "Ñanacampantan, well versed in the four Vedas" (nanmarai nanacampantan, I.4.11), and praises the brahmins (antanar) of Tillai (modern Chidambaram) as "men who have conquered cosmic evil / through sacred learning / and the tending of the sacred fire" (I.80.1; Poem 102).80 Such conservatism is explained by many factors: the Agamic roots of Tamil Saiva religion, the fluidity of class relationships in the Tamil society of the time, and the closeness of brahmin and Vellala in the Tamil social hierarchy.81 And yet the saints' hymns are full of images of a "communitas" within which social hierarchy is radically overturned.82 The poets assert that unswerving devotion to Siva overrides all other affiliations and markers of identity and is the supreme criterion for respect, friendship, and communal consciousness among the Tamil Saivas. Appar puts it eloquently:

^{57 &}quot;Karrānkeriyompik kalıyai vārāme cerrār. . . ." The Pallavas and Colas made gifts of entire villages (brahmadeya, "gift to brahmins") to brahmins. Chidambaram is one of the most important among these brahmin settlements; Cuntarar begins his list of devotees with "those who serve the brahmins who live in Tillai [Chidambaram]."

¹⁵ From the earliest times, there have been several kinds of brahmins in the Tamil area, each showing various degrees of assimilation to the indigenous culture (Hart, Poems, pp. 51-56). In contemporary Tamilnadu, Smarta brahmins claim superiority over Adiśaivas 'Tamil Saiva brahmins' and kurukkal (priests). See Charles J. Fuller, Servants of the Goddess: The Priests of a South Indian Temple (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984),

Were they to offer me both treasures of Kubera's world. and give me earth and heaven itself to rule, the wealth of decaying mortals would be as nothing to me, when those who gave were not single-minded devotees of our great Lord. But the leper with rotting limbs, the outcaste, even the foul pulaiyan who skins and eats cows, even these men, if they are servants of him who shelters the Ganges in his long hair, I worship them, they are gods to me.

Appar VI.309.10 (Poem 211)

The key to the paradox lies in the ideal of "service" (ațimai, tonțu) itself, which is the highest qualification for becoming an atiyar. Cariyai (acts of service and attendance, from Sanskrit caryā, conduct) and kiriyai (Sanskrit kriyā, deed, [ritual] act, rite) constitute the first two aspects of religious activity in the fourfold classification of the Agama ritual texts; they are also the types of action that form the subjects of the Nāyaṇārs' description of service. Acts of service that involve manual labor or indirectly contribute to the worship of Siva-for instance, digging wells near Siva's temples, gathering flowers, or tending to the lamps intended for the pūjā ritual-are classed under cariyai. Ritual worship, with an emphasis on devotional attitudes, is classed under kiriyai.83 The metaphysical bases of the Agamic classification are fully developed in the Saiva Siddhanta texts, ch. 3. However, in the Tamil region (Vellala) Mutaliyar, Pillai and certain other noubrahmin caste groups have enjoyed rank and prestige equal to that of brahmins. In some social and ritual contexts, the Vellalas have greater power, authority, and status than the brahmins. On the high status of peasant communities in the Tamil area, see Stein, Peasant State.

^{*2 &}quot;Communitas" is Victor Turner's term in The Ritual Process: Structure and Anti-Structure (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1969).

³³ Dhavamony, Love of God, pp. 234-37, gives a clear description of the four paths as explained in Arunanti's Śivañānacittiyār. The various Śaiva Siddhānta authors differ on the precise demarcation between cariyai and kiriyai; however, they agree on the point that kiriyai involves a formal, ritual component combined with an attitude of devotion.

in which cariyai, kiriyai, yōkam (Sanskrit yoga, contemplative discipline), and ñāṇam (Sanskrit jñāna, knowledge), are hierarchically organized, each one taking the soul a step closer to its release from the bondage of karma. Although sincere devotion is the guiding principle behind each of the modes or stages in this hierarchy, cariyai and kiriyai are lower, preparatory modes of religiosity, with ñāṇam, the knowledge of the true nature of the relationship between the soul (pacu) and the Lord (pati), being the highest instrument of release. His is where the emphasis of the poetsaints is different. Though the poets are aware of technical distinctions among the four modes, they do not speak of a hierarchy of devotional acts. They focus instead on cariyai and kiriyai and portray manual labor and ritual worship as modes that encompass the meanings and benefits of discipline and knowledge. The Nāyaṇārs also suggest the meanings of service chiefly through their portrayal of exemplary devotees, and in personal and emotional terms, rather than in terms of proper behavior.

The Tamil devotees cited as exemplars in the Nayanars' patikams are true "servants," either by serving Siva directly or by serving his devotees. Naminanti kept the lamps in the Tiruvarur temple burning with water when they ran out of oil; the Pantiya queen Mankaiyarkkaraci and her minister Kulaccirai humbled themselves in the service of Siva's devotees; men, women, and even animals—like the rat who kept the lamps burning in Maraikkātu shrine, and the spider who built a canopy for Śiva's image out of thread from his own body—lovingly perform the ritual worship of Śiva at risk to their bodies and lives. Kannappar and Canticar, the two Nāyaṇārs whom the Tēvāram poets repeatedly invoke as exemplary atiyar, epitomize the unique blend of qualities that characterize the Tamil Saiva ideal: great concern for the proper performance of ritual worship, and a passionate, all-consuming, personal love for God, before which all rules and laws of conduct and ceremony crumble.85 Kannappar was a low-caste hunter who broke all the rules of ritual purity when, making ritual offerings of meat and other forbidden things, he lovingly worshipped an image of Siva that he found in a forest shrine.86 The great power of his love for Siva was proved to the world by the Lord himself. While engaged in worshipping his God, the devout hunter readily dug out his own eyes to replace the eyes of the image, which Siva had caused to bleed in order to test the sincerity of Kannappar's devotion. In an equally remarkable act of devotion, the brahmin boy Canticar cut off with an axe the foot of his own father when he tried to stop his son from ritually bathing a linga that he had lovingly fashioned with earth. The lives of Kannappar and Cantīcar contain the central themes of the lives of the sixty-three saints as told in Cekkilar's Periya puranam.87 The list of these Nāvanārs includes men and women; kings and peasants; brahmins; a potter, a cowherd, and a hunter, all members of low castes; and even a bulaiyan, a person who handles unclean objects like animal skins and is therefore an outcaste.88 A number of the Nayanars spent their lives engaged in serving at Siva's shrines. Some provided flowers, sandalwood, incense, and other materials required for the ritual; others performed acts of service at the shrine-lighting lamps, sweeping the courtyards, serving as musicians and priests; yet others, like Queen Mankaiyarkkaraci, served other devotees. As in the stories of Kannappar and Canticar, the dramatic moment in the lives of these other Nayanars occurs when they commit an extraordinary act-of self-sacrifice or the sacrifice of those who are dear to them-in order to preserve the integrity of their service to God or his devotees. These acts can be staggeringly gruesome, as exemplified by Kannappar's plucking out his eyes or Canticar's cutting off his father's foot. In each case, the sacrificial act, epitomized in the shedding of blood, which is considered to be a pollutant in the context of the Agamic worship ritual, reveals the spontaneous, passionate, emotional devotion that underlies the Tamil bhakti ideal of ritual.89 The value of the ritual act is measured not by its conventional propriety or by the status of the person performing it but by the utter sincerity and passion with which it is performed.

⁸⁴ Dhavamony, Love of God, pp. 118, 215, 268–70. G. Subrahmaniya Pillai, "Introduction and History of Śaiva Siddhānta," in Collected Lectures on Śaiva Siddhānta: 1946–1954 (Annamalainagar: Annamalai University, 1965), pp. 50–51.

⁸⁵ Canticar is also known as Cantecar. Kannappar's life is the subject of several hagiographical poems in addition to Cekkilär's account in the Periya puranam.

⁸⁶ Consult the summaries of these lives and commentaries on the significance of the lives, in Yogi Suddhananda Bharati, The Grand Epic of Saivism (Tirunelveli/Madras: South Indian Saiva Siddhanta Works [hereafter SISSW] Publishing Society, 1970).

EXPERIENCE AND EXPRESSION IN THE POETRY OF THE SAINTS

Joy alone is ours, not sorrow, for we belong forever

⁸⁷ It is not clear from the earliest narratives of the Kannappar legend, including the account in the Periya purăṇam, whether the image that Kannappar worshipped was an aniconic or anthropomorphic image of Siva. The image might have been a mukha-linga, a linga with a face or faces. In the later sculptural tradition Kannappar is usually shown worshipping a linga image. On this point, see Narayana Ayyar, Origin and Early History, pp. 163–64. On the mukha-linga, see Stella Kramrisch, The Presence of Siva (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1981), ch. 7.

⁸⁸ On the caste composition of the group of sixty-three Nāyanārs, see Zvelebil, Smile of

Murugan, pp. 192-93.

⁸⁹ See George Hart's formulation of the tension between the concern for propriety and the respect for sincere emotion as exemplified by the acts of the Nāyaṇār Ciruttoṇṭar, in "The Little Devotee: Cēkkilār's Story of Ciruttoṇṭar," in Sanskrit and Indian Studies, ed. Nagatomi et al., pp. 217–36.

to Śańkara, who is the supreme Lord, . . . and we have reached his beautiful, flower-fresh feet.

Appar VI.312.1 (Poem 240)

For the Tēvāram poets and their community, "to serve" Śiva, simply to be an aṭiyār, is both the means and the end of the religious life. To be an aṭiyār is to commune with Śiva through love; to be an aṭiyār is also to bring out the love that is within, to express it in every way. Emotional bhakti is deeply concerned with the private, interior nature of human religious experience. It is, at the same time, the most exuberantly expressive kind of personal religion in the Hindu tradition. The Tamils celebrate the poetry of the saints as the perfect embodiment of both aspects of emotional bhakti.

The three great poets stand in an interesting relationship to the rest of the Navanars. Compared to the violent and spectacular crises that are characteristic of the lives of the other saints, the pattern of the poet-saints' lives seems almost humdrum. Yet it is these poets who, along with their fellow poet Mänikkaväcakar, became the Camayakurus, "Preceptors of the Tradition." They were the men who literally led their fellow devotees around the Tamil countryside, seeking communion with their God in every temple. They were more dynamic as cult leaders and more prolific in their literary activity than any other Navanar poet before them. These achievements in themselves are enough to account for the high status that Appar, Cuntarar, and Campantar have earned in the Tamil Saiva tradition. Yet their veneration in the cult ultimately rests on a well-defined premise: the special significance of poetry as a religious mode in Tamil Saivism. Cēkkilār, who aims at elucidating the essential significance of the life of each Nāyanār as a model of devotion to Siva, explores this very theme in his narrative of the lives of the Tēvāram saints. 90 The basic pattern of Cēkkilār's account of the lives of these three Nāyanārs is provided by the recurrent descriptive themes of the saint's journey to a shrine and the composition of a particular hymn at that shrine. The hagiographer tirelessly records the circumstances under which each poem was composed, dwelling on the emotional aspects of the scene, as in this description of Appar's acts upon arriving at the temple of Siva in Vilimilalai:

He approached and entered the temple where the Lord who has the golden mountain for his bow dwells in delight.

He circumambulated it.

⁹⁰ We may discern this meaning in Appar's famous line: "en kaṭan paṇi ceytu kiṭappatë" ("my task is only to serve"), Appar V.133.9 (Poem 172).

prostrated himself at the sacred courtyard, entered the presence of the three-eyed god, bull rider crowned with matted red hair.

Then he fell at his feet, rose, sobbed out . . .
He folded his hands in adoration, and praised the Lord's feet; his deep love melted in a stream, the flood from his eyes gushed out and spread over his body.

Standing thus he sang a garland of words of praise:
"Those who do not belong to the red-haired god are trapped in the path of Evil"— this Tāṇṭakam poem which shows us the way to our release.
When he had sung, his ceaseless love welled up stronger, . . . and he still praised that jewel-mountain with the golden form in Vilimilalai of beautiful streams.91

In the imagery of this sequence of verses, and others similar to it, the intense desire to see and experience the Lord, which draws the saint to a particular temple, itself becomes an overflowing expression of love that physically manifests itself in torrential tears and, verbally, in a flood of poetry. Poetry is the bhakti experience made palpable. The hymn is the embodiment of the unification of emotion and ritual, interior (akam) and exterior (puram)—the experience of love, and its expression; in this lies the value of the hymns for Tamil Śaivas. In their hymns the three saints articulated the entire range of Tamil Śaiva religious experience. Tamil song, the saints' medium of expression, makes that experience accessible to their fellow devotees, across space and time, with a remarkable vividness and immediacy. So powerful and vital is the link between the Nā-yaṇārs' love for Śiva and their expression of that love, that all Tamil Śaivas may participate—"to participate" is one of the primary meanings of the root from which bhakti is derived—in that love relationship simply ⁹¹ Periya purānam 5.21 (Tirunāvukkaracunāyanār Purānam), verses 252-54.

⁹² I have explored this idea in detail in: Indira V. Peterson, "Lives of the Wandering Singers: Pilgrimage and Poetry in Tamil Saivite Hagiography," History of Religions 22, no. 4 (1983): 338–60.

by adopting the paradigmatic expressive mode, by singing the Tēvāram songs:

Moved by intense love for Śiva Ñāṇacampantaṇ, the Tamil poet from Pukali of pure streams, worships in song the Lord who dwells in Ārūr of paddy fields where beautiful waterlilies bloom. He who can recite these ten verses and listen to them will wipe his life clean of sorrow,

The power of the saints' songs has indeed moved generations of Tamil Śaivas to treasure and to love them, to know and sing and listen to them. The sequence of identifications made by the poet-saints, that love of Śiva is the love of Tamil places, Tamil landscapes, the Tamil language and music, ends with the inclusion of the Tēvāram hymns, the songs of the Nāyaṇārs, as the final element. The text becomes a symbol for the bhakti experience in its entirety: Love of the Tēvāram hymns is love of Śiva.

The Lives of a Text: The Role of the *Tēvāram*Hymns in Tamil Śaivism

By all means, let us, with regard to anything, know how it became; but let us study further how and what it went on becoming. The study of history must in large part be the study of creativity.

-- Wilfred Cantwell Smith1

In a continuous tradition going back at least to the time of the recovery of the hymns, the Tēvāram has remained the fundamental instrument for Tamil Saivas in their personal, communal, and ritual worship of Siva. Devotees and professional hymn singers sing and recite the hymns, in informal as well as ceremonial settings. The patikams can be heard in homes, temple courtyards, concert halls, and festival processions. Holy men sing them on city streets and country roads.² The rise in popularity of other gods and cults, as well as the "secularization" of modern Tamil life, appear to have in no way diminished the affectionate regard in which Tamil Saivas hold the three Nāyaṇārs and their songs.

The institution, established in Pallava and Cola times, of employing specialists called ōtuvār ("one who chants or sings") to sing selections from the Tirumurai texts during the worship ritual and on other public occasions, continues in major Śiva temples in the Tamil region. In many shrines, the "song of the place" (talattup patikam) is inscribed on the walls of the temple (see illus. 15).³ The myths and personages celebrated by the Nāyaṇārs, and the poets themselves, are an integral part of Tamil temple iconography. In the temple, the words, images, and sounds of the Tēvāram surround the Tamil Śaivas.

¹ "The Study of Religion and the Study of the Bible," Journal of the American Academy of Religion, 34, no. 2 (1971): 131-40, at p. 135.

² Kingsbury and Phillips, Hymns of the Tamil Saivite Saints, p. 63, tell us that in Madras "there used to be a beggar . . . who recited it [Appar's poem "ariyāṇai antaṇartam . . . "], and it alone, all day long."

The hymns of the three saints have been, and continue to be, at the center of the Tamil Śaivas' consciousness as a religious community. Just as the Tēvāram helped forge a new cultural and communal identity for the Tamils in the age of the Nāyaṇārs, its veneration as "The Tamil Veda" (tamilmarai)—the term used by the twelfth-century hagiographer to refer to the hymns⁴—played a crucial role in helping the Tamil Śaivas maintain a distinct, and distinctly Tamil, sectarian identity. This latter function of the text must be seen in the context of major developments within the Tamil Śaiva sect, and in religion in Tamil India, from the twelfth century to the present.

The Tamil Veda: The Hymns as Sectarian Scripture

Bhakti cults sprang up all over India in the wake of the Tamil devotional movements. In South India, forces of religious syncretism and sectarian development were simultaneously at work in the period that followed the age of the Nāyaṇārs. On the one hand, the great Sanskritic philosophers and sectarian leaders of the South wrote definitive interpretations of the Sanskrit sacred texts, covering both śruti ("revealed literature," "the literature of the Vedas and Upaniṣads") and smṛti ("traditional" sacred texts such as the Bhagavad Gītā); on the other, emotional bhakti was fully incorporated into the brahmanical and traditionalist segment of South Indian society, especially in the Tamil region. Thus, while brahmanism of the pan-Indian type flourished with renewed vigor, emotional devotion to Śiva or Viṣṇu was no longer a phenomenon peculiar to the "vernacular" cults. During this time, Tamil Śaivism established itself as a separate sect, mainly on the basis of the Śaiva Siddhānta philosophy.

Unlike the philosophers of the non-Tamil Hindu sects, and of the Tamil Vaiṣṇava sect, the authors of the Siddhānta texts wrote primarily in Tamil; the fourteen fundamental treatises (cittānta cāttiram) of the tra-

³ The discovery of a patikam attributed to Campantar inscribed on a wall at the Tiruvitaivāy temple shows that this must have been a practice of some antiquity. In many Tamil temples coday, the hymn is painted on the walls of the inner courtyard of the temple.

⁴ E.g., Periya purānam 6.319; "pannu tamiļ magaiyām patikam."

Sankara, Rāmānuja, and Madhva were the outstanding figures in this group. Rāmānuja was the great teacher of the Srīvaiṣṇava sect.

LIVES OF A TEXT

dition are in Tamil.⁶ Because of this the Siddhānta philosophy did not get wide recognition outside the sect, as did the Sanskrit philosophical writings of the other sects, and remained in large measure the internal possession of the community of Tamil Śaiva intellectuals.

Many factors contributed to the differences in emphasis between the poets and the professional philosophers in Tamil Saivism. While the Siddhanta philosophers shared in the Navanars' world view and their concern with ritual and temple worship imbued with devotion, they rarely established a direct connection between the emotionally charged poems of the saints and their own doctrinal writings, in which they expound the nature of soul, God, bondage, and release. The link between the two lineages of teachers (kuru, ācāriyār), the poets and the philosophers, remained a tenuous one. Though the theologians treated the saints' hymns with the reverence due scripture, they did not connect the two streams of thought through commentaries. Among the sacred texts of the Great Tradition, the Siddhanta philosophers placed greater emphasis on the philosophy of the Agamas than on the fundamental scriptures of the orthodox tradition. In all the above features the Tamil Saiva philosophers stand in marked contrast to their Tamil Vaisnava counterparts, the theologians and philosophers of the branch of the Vaisnava sect that developed out of the bhakti cult of the Alvars. Several of the great Acaryas of the Śrivaisnava sect wrote in Sanskrit,8 but they developed a comprehensive exegetical system in which the poetry and theology of the Alvars were directly connected to their own formulations of doctrine. Through a number of powerful arguments, the Acaryas established the authority of the words and ideas in the Tivviyap pirapantam hymns of the Alvars as being equal to that of the Vedic literature. The resultant philosophy, flowing out of the two streams of "scriptural" tradition, the Tamil and the Sanskrit, was called the "ubhayavedanta" or "the philosophy of the two Vedas or Vedic traditions." These differences between the Tamil Saiva

⁶ This, in spite of the fact that several of the sectarian teachers, both brahmin and Vellala, were Sanskrit scholars. Some of the Śaiva Siddhānta philosophers also wrote works in Sanskrit (Sivaraman, Śaivism; Natarajan, City of the Cosmic Dance, ch. 12), and as Stein (Peasant State, pp. 230–40) and Zvelebil (Tamil Literature, 1975, pp. 250–51) point out, because of their orientation toward Sanskritic ritual and doctrine, and the connections with sects in other regions, the Tamil Śaiva sectarian centers were actually centers of Sanskritization.

⁷ J. Estlin Carpenter clearly states the Tamil Saiva position: The Siddhanta philosophers see both the Vedas and Agamas as emanating from the Lord and therefore true, but not of equal value. "The Vedas are more general...; the Agamas are the more special, suitable for advanced believers.... Revelation is... progressive." Theism in Medieval India (1921; reprint Delhi: Munshiram Manoharlal, 1977), p. 359.

^{*} E.g., Yāmuna, Rāmānuja.

⁹ Expounded in a large body of commentaries and subcommentaries, written first in Sanskrit, and later in an amalgam of Sanskrit and Tamil, called manipraväla ("mixture of ruby and Vaisnava sects are closely related to the differences that developed in their cultural milieu and caste orientation after the era of the poet-saints. the Saivas becoming predominantly Vellala and the Vaisnavas, predominantly brahmin.

From the Cola period on membership in the Tamil Saiva cult stabilized. being composed predominantly of prosperous nonbrahmin peasant castes who ranked high in the regional caste hierarchy. 10 The nonbrahmin Vellalas had always played an important part in the cult's leadership. Appar and many other Nayanars were Vellalas. The Siddhanta philosophers also came from both brahmin and Vellala caste backgrounds. 11 The heads of the Tamil Saiva sectarian matams, which flourished in the fourteenth century and earlier, have traditionally been Vellalas.12 As for the lower castes among the Tamil nonbrahmins, though they have traditionally professed allegiance to Tamil Saivism, their ritual and worship activity, as well as their mythology and lore, have centered more on local and tutelary deities than on the major Hindu gods, 13 Thus throughout the history of the Tamil Saiva sect, Vellala agrarian communities have formed the sect's core constituency and leadership.

As prosperous landowners and farmers, Tamil Saivas have always given economic support to the major Siva temples in the Tamil countryside, and have been able to shape and influence the administration and ritual system of these temples. 14 However, since their inception, Tamil Saiva sectarian centers and communities have been involved in a complex economic and social power relationship with royal patrons as well as with the brahmin elites of the region. 15 In the last two centuries, especially in the Kaveri Delta, where both brahmins and Vellalas have traditionally

10 See Chapter 3, note 81 above.

15 See Burton Stein, "Temples in Tamil Country, 1300-1750 A.D.," in South Indian Temples, ed. Stein, pp. 11-45.

15 The patterns of sectarian and caste-group alliance and competition, involving royal patrons, have been analyzed for the South Indian Vaisnava case in Arjun Appadurai, Worship and Conflict under Colonial Rule: A South Indian Case, Cambridge South Asian Studies 27 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1981), ch. 2.

and coral"). On this literature, see K.K.A. Venkatachari, The Manipravala Literature of the Śrivaisnava Ācaryas: 12th-15th Century A.D., Anantacharya Research Institute Series no. III (Bombay: Anantacharya Research Institute, 1978).

¹¹ Meykantar (thirteenth century) was a Vellala; Arunanti and Umapati Civam were Tamil Śaiva brahmins. See Zvelebil, Tamil Literature, 1975, ch. 10.

¹² On the lineages of teachers associated with particular matams, see Zvelebil, Tamil Literature, 1975, pp. 206-7.

¹⁴ For instance, the Tamil Saiva matam centers ("Atīṇam," administrative centers) at Tarumapuram, Tiruvavatutugai, and Tiruppanantal have power and control in the major Siva temples in Tamilnadu. For the history of the Tarumapuram Ātīṇam and its holdings, see A. Kaliyanacuntara Tecikar, "Tarumaiy atinak kuruparamparai varalaru," Makakumpapisēka vilā malar (Tarumapuram: Vaidvanāthasvāmi Devasthānam, 1970), pp. 338-466.

LIVES OF A TEXT

been powerful, Smārta brahmins have vied with Tamil Śaivas for ideological influence in the temple. 16

As early as the age of the Nāyaṇārs, and certainly by the age of the Siddhanta philosophy, a large number of Tamil brahmins had adopted the syncretistic philosophy and practice known as Smarta traditionalism.17 Moving away from sectarian polarities, they not only adopted the worship of all the major deities of Hinduism but combined their strongly Sanskritic religious orientation with aspects of Tamil Saiva and Vaisnava devotionalism and the ascetic philosophy of Śańkarācārya. Apart from this eclecticism, the Tamil Smartas identify themselves as Saivas, and worship in Siva temples. The Smartas accept the singing of the Tevaram songs as part of the Agamic heritage of their religion and celebrate the presence and lore of the Tamil Saiva saints as part of the history and iconography of the Tamil Siva temple. In this sense, the Navanars and their hymns are not simply the exclusive sectarian scripture and property of the Tamil Saiva community. Yet they continue to have a unique symbolic significance for Tamil Saivas. Today, in the context of worship in the temple, the Tamil Saiva sense of sectarian identity is expressed primarily through their attitude toward the saints and the Tirumurai hymns.

Consider the attitude of Tamil Śaivas to the performance of the $T\bar{e}$ - $v\bar{a}ram$ in private worship and ritual. When Tamil Śaivas worship at the subsidiary shrines¹⁸ in which various aspects of Śiva are depicted within the Śiva temple, they sing or recite selections from Tamil sacred literature, especially from the $T\bar{e}v\bar{a}ram$ and the $Tiruv\bar{a}cakam$. At the same shrines, the Tamil brahmins and affiliates of other sects prefer to use late Sanskrit devotional stotras, $n\bar{a}m\bar{a}val\bar{i}s$ (litanies of the names of the deity), and other Sanskrit texts. ¹⁹ When the $\bar{o}tuv\bar{a}rs$ sing the Tamil hymns at the end of the $p\bar{u}j\bar{a}$ ritual, the Smārta brahmin worshippers regard this practice as one of many items in the ritual and attach no special significance to it. To the Tamil Śaiva worshippers, on the other hand, the part played by these hymns in ritual is a point of great doctrinal significance, legitimizing and confirming their belief that Śiva loves the offering of Tamil song equally with the Sanskrit mantras. This was certainly the view held by the Nā-

¹⁶ The Pallava-Côla institution of brahmadeya ("gift to brahmins") villages, especially in the Kaveri Delta, has resulted in concentrated areas of brahmin power in the Tamil region. On Smarta power and influence in the Tanjore district, see Peterson, "The kṛti."

¹⁷ On the rise of the Smartas, see Hopkins, Hindu Religious Tradition, ch. 7, and Nila-kanta Sastri, Development of Religion, pp. 60-61.

¹⁸ Ranging from recesses and niches in the inner walls of the main building, to separate auxiliary shrines, depicting forms of the central deity or of other divinities, saints, and devotees. See K. V. Soundara Rajan, South Indian Temple Styles (Delhi: Munshiram Manoharlal, 1972), p. 15, app. A.

¹⁹ The authors of most of these Sanskrit works are South Indian Smarta brahmins. See Gonda, Medieval Religious Literature, ch. 14.

yaṇārs themselves: "My Lord who wears the cool koṇṇai blossom / rules in Accirupākkam . . . / where Tamil and Northern words join his feet" (Campantar 1.77.4).²⁰

The difference in Tamil Saiva and Smarta attitudes toward the Tamil hymns of the saints is dramatically brought out in their apprehension of the singing of these songs at great ceremonial occasions, such as festival processions. At Siva temple festivals a special image (Sanskrit utsavamūrti, festival image) of Siva, appropriate to the particular festival, is taken out in procession around the temple.²¹ Brahmins, chanting passages from Vedic literature, especially the Satarudrīya hymn, 22 lead the procession; crowds of devotees follow; a group (kosti) of otuvars singing the Tevaram forms the rear of the procession.²³ Although it would be difficult to determine the date of this particular arrangement of elements in the procession, we have descriptions, in the saints' own hymns and in later literature, of such festival processions that included brahmins, devotees, and singers of the saints' hymns.²⁴ Contemporary worshippers offer their own interpretation of the disposition of the Vedas and the Tēvāram in relation to the deity in the procession. According to the Smartas and the brahmin reciters of the Veda, the Vedas take "first place" as the primary scripture; their position at the head of the line reaffirms the supremacy of the Vedas as sruti (revealed literature), crucial to the proper performance of the ceremony, and the superiority of the brahmins as the top-ranking group in the caste hierarchy. Smarta worshippers see the ōtuvārs and the Tēvāram as a subsidiary element of the ceremonial complex, rightly placed at the end of the procession.25 The Tamil Saiva devotees explain the relative placement of the texts differently; the otuvars walk at the end of the procession, since the hymns of the saints are the final and most accessible embodiment, in the form of mantras, of the essence of the Vedic mantras and of the Agamas, which are the word of Siva himself.26 Even more significant is the fact that the Tirumurai is sung simultaneously with the Veda, an act that affirms their sectarian view that the Tēvāram hymns

^{20 &}quot;tamile colum vațacolun tăṇilar cêra / ammalark konraiy aṇintav emmațikal / acciru-păkkama tăței koṇțăre."

²¹ The following description of recitation patterns in such a procession is based on my observation of the Pradoṣa-Pūjā (Twilight Ceremony) procession at the Kapālīśvara temple, Mylapore, Madras, and the Ārudrā (Tīruvātīrai) Festival procession at the Marundeeswarar temple in Tīruvāṇmiyūr in July 1978 and December-January 1979.

²² See my discussion of this hymn in chapter 3 above.

²³ The ōtuvār kōsti at the Mylapore temple, in July 1978, consisted of two singers.

²⁴ E.g., Appar IV.21 (Poem 98); a description of the Tiruvātirai festiva! i. Tiruvārūr.

²⁵ Discussion with Smārta brahmin worshippers and Vaidika brahmin priests (cāstirikaļ) at the Kapālīśvara temple, Madras, July 1978.

²⁶ See note 7 above.

LIVES OF A TEXT

are equal to the Vedas as scripture and mantra.²⁷ Again, the words of the Nāyanārs themselves are cited in support of this equation, which is very much a part of the Tamil Saiva sectarian consciousness. The idea that the Tēvāram is a Veda (marai) is deliberately inculcated in the ōtuvārs themselves when they are being trained for their profession at the training schools run by Tamil Saiva sectarian institutions connected with temples. 28 Ōtuvār trainees are taught to recite the Tēvāram through a process of memorization and repetition very similar to that of Vedic recitation. Since the teaching of musical compositions in India is normally an oral tradition, it is natural that the Tēvāram songs are taught orally. But the ōtuvār trainees are continually reminded that they are initiates, like students of the Veda, and that they are memorizing the Tamil Veda through the techniques of Vedic adhyayana.29 The insistence on "Vedic" status, especially in such detail, is no doubt motivated in part by the desire of Tamil Saivas to give their religion impeccable credentials as a full-fledged sect with a proper primary scripture. Rivalry with the Śrīvaisnavas, whose teachers have been eminently successful in relating the Sanskrit-Vedic tradition to Tamil Vaisnava doctrine and practice, may also have been a factor in this development. Ironically, the Tamil Saivas only accept the Vedas as revealed scripture, without attaching fundamental doctrinal significance to them; as we have seen, the Agamas and the Tirumurai take pride of place in this respect. Since the Tamil Vaisnava theologians directly integrated the ideas of the Vedas and smrtis with the songs of the Alvars and the Sanskrit theology and philosophy of Ramanuja, the nonbrahmin as well as the brahmin members of the Śrīvaisnava sect can di-

27 Discussion with ōtuvārs and Tamil Śaiva devotees at the Kapālīšvara temple, July 1978. The simultaneity of the Vedic and Tēvāram singing was brought home to me in the process of recording the two performances on tape at the Pradoşa Pūjā festival in July 1978. Having started out by recording the ōtuvārs at the rear of the procession, I moved on to the brahmins reciting the Śatarudrīya at the head of the line. While recording the latter, I could not hear the Tēvāram singing at the end of the long line of people; however, I could see that the ōtuvārs continued to sing even as I was listening to the brahmins.

²⁸ I visited the "Tēvāra Pāṭacālai" (school for Tēvāram singing) run by the Tarumapuram Ātīnam near Māyavaram, Tanjore district, in July 1978 and observed the methods of teaching and learning used in the school. Vēlāyuta Mutaliyār, a retired ōtuvār, instructed fifteen boys, ranging from five to fourteen years in age, in memorizing and singing the Tirumurai.

29 Not only the technique of instruction but also the patterns of gurukulavāsa ("living with the guru during the years of instruction") at the Tēvāram school were modeled on those of the Ātīṇam's school for Vedic study (adhyayana), which was situated next door to the Tēvāram school. Memorization and the oral nature of the hymns were emphasized, though the book containing the seven Tirumurais was always kept in front of the teacher. The boys memorized the words and the rhythmic and melodic patterns of two to three hymns per day. On Vedic recitation, consult Alain Daniélou's notes to his recording of Vedic recitation in Daniélou, Vedic Recitation and Chant: The Music of India, record no. 6, UNESCO collection, A Musical Anthology of the Orient, Kassel/Basel: Bārenreiter.

rectly relate their devotionalism with both the Vedas and the Tamil songs of their saints. The Tamil Saiva situation is different, in that, though devotees can think of the Vedas and the Tirumurai as being equal in scriptural sanctity, they cannot emotionally identify with the Vedic sruti ("heard," primary scripture) literature, whose direct relevance to the unique sectarian scripture has not been clearly communicated to the average worshipper by the sectarian teachers.30

The Tamil Saiva view of the performance of the Tirumurai gives us insight into the manifold function of these songs as the sacred literature of their sect. As the "Tamil Veda," the Tirumurai is the only formal part of Tamil temple worship and ritual that is of exclusive doctrinal significance to Tamil Saivas as followers of the four poet-teachers. It is also the only ceremonial text that-for the reasons given above-draws from them the kind of emotional response that the Vedas inspire in the Tamil brahmins. At the same time, unlike the Sanskrit Veda-and more like the smrti and stotra literature—the Tēvāram and Tiruvācakam are not bound to ritual functions or restricted to ritual specialists;³¹ as song-offerings. they are directly available to Tamil Saiva devotees as the means for their personal worship of Siva. Further, the songs are looked upon not merely as mantras to be recited but as the literature of the saints' experience, to be experienced by all Tamil Saiva devotees. The songs of the saints are freely accessible to all Tamil Saivas: since the content of the hymns, as described above, has become the center of Tamil Saiva experience, and since the structural contours of the language of the Tēvāram continue to remain functionally close to the literary and spoken idioms of the Tamils, the hymns are intelligible to the average Tamil even after thirteen centuries. To this day, devotees directly consult the words of the saints for guidance in various situations, and sing them when they seek personal inspi-

34 This is one of the ways in which Zvelebil distinguishes between the function of the Vedic and the Tamil Saiva bliakt: hymns in their respective cults. Zvelebil, Smile of Murugan, p. 201.

³⁰ In Śrīvaisnava temple processions, the position of the Vedas and the hymns of the Alvars is the reverse of the Saiva case; here the singers of the hymns walk before the image of the deity, while the Veda reciters follow after. Śrīvaiṣṇavas see this as a symbolic representation of the ubhayavedānta ("two Vedas") doctrine. Although some Śrīvaiṣṇavas interpret the position of the Tamil hymns as indicating their priority in the hierarchy of texts, the Vedic sruti literature continues to play a central role in Śrīvaisnava doctrine, ritual, and culture. On the recitation of the hymns of the Alvars at the "festival of the recitation of the sacred texts" (adhyayanotsava) see Paul Younger, "Singing the Tamil Hymnbook in the Tradition of Ramanuja: The Adyayanotsava Festival in Śrirankam," History of Religions 20, no. 2 (February 1982): 272-93. In the Tamil Saiva case, in the centuries of sectarian development after the Nāyaṇārs the Vedic literature progressively lost the direct affective value we see it as having in the poetry of the saints. If anything, in this tradition the hymns of the saints completely take over the symbolic value of the Veda. See the discussion in Ramanujan, Hymns, pp. 130-32.

ration or comfort as well as devotional experience.³² In this way the Tirumurai simultaneously functions as sruti and smṛti, mantra and stotra, classical and popular song, and ceremonial and personal scripture for the Tamil Śaivas, bringing together categories usually kept separate in Great Traditional Hinduism.³³

The Singer of Hymns: Performance as Interpretation

The vividness and emotional appeal of the Tirumurai hymns and the direct access the Tamil Śaivas have to them have rendered learned commentaries and traditional interpretive devices a matter of interest mainly to Tamil Śaiva intellectuals. Yet there is a special tradition in which the songs are interpreted for all Tamil Śaiva devotees: this takes place in the performance of the songs by $\bar{o}tuv\bar{a}rs$.

According to Tamil Saivas and scholars the institution of the ōtuvār is now in danger of extinction. Research in the musicological aspects of the Tēvāram has established that the musical tradition of the hymns—itself an eleventh-century reconstruction—has undergone major changes in the recent past. The rapid and tremendous developments that took place in the courtly and authoritative tradition of South Indian classical music (Carnatic music) from the sixteenth to the nineteenth centuries have obviously had a great influence on the music of the Tēvāram, so much so that the pan tunes of the hymns have been irretrievably lost, having been replaced by Carnatic rāga scales. In 1977 and 1978 I went on a pilgrimage to the Tēvāram temples, following the paths of the Nāyaṇārs and recording the singing of the Tēvāram hymns at these places. I found a small but living tradition of Tēvāram performance by ōtuvārs: flourishing in popular shrine centers and Tēvāram temples such as Madurai and Ti-

³² Notes are provided in modern printed editions of the Têvāram regarding the efficacy of consulting, studying, and reciting specific Tēvāram hymns in specific situations in one's personal life: desire for marriage or children, a death in the family, bad health, financial loss. In this context, Tamil Śaivas use the Têvāram very much as many Christians use the Bible. For some examples, see Vellaivāraṇaṇ, Paṇṇiru tirumurai varalāru, preface, p. i.

³³ Bhakti songs continue to play this integrative role in South Indian culture. On the similar function of the devotional krti in Carnatic music today, see Peterson, "The krti."

³⁴ Consult the Proceedings of the Pan Research Conferences (1949–1968): Le. Pa. Ka. Irāmanātan Ceṭṭiyār, ed., Pan ārāycciyum atan muṭivukalin tokuppum, comp. M. Periyacāmit Tūran (Madras: Tamil Icaic Cankam, 1974). I attended the Pan Research Conference in Madras in December 1979.

¹⁵ Note, however, that the Tēvāram hymns continue to be sung in a style that is different from that of Carnatic music.

³⁶ Among the major temples I visited were Kapāliśvarar (Madras), Marundeeswarar (Tiruvāṇmiyūr), Tiruvāṇm, Cīrkāli, Ekāmranātha (Kanchipuram), Kuṃbheśvara (Kumbhakonam), Māyavaram, Vaittiśvaran Köyil, Maturai (Miṇākṣi-Cokkanātar), Brihadīśvara (Tanjore), and Tiruvannāmalai.

ruvärür, barely sustained in more obscure shrines, and in Madras, an important center of Tamil culture, enthusiastically supported by large Tamil Saiva audiences in public concerts organized by the tamil icai (Tamil music) revival movement, itself a part of the larger Tamil revival movement in Tamilnadu.³⁷ The following account of the contemporary performance tradition is based on the observations made during my two trips.

The responsibility of the ōtuvār, the member of a caste of religious artists,³⁸ is to sing hymns from the Tirumurai during daily rituals and ceremonial occasions at the temple. The typical ōtuvār is recruited for the job as a young boy of seven or eight and apprenticed under a teacher at one of the Tamil Saiva maṭam centers.³⁹ In his years at the tēvāra pāṭacālai (Tēvāram school) the boy memorizes the hymns of the Tēvāram and Tiruwācakam and selections from the other Tirumurai books, and learns the techniques of musical performance.

Today, the ōtuvār in the Tamil Śiva temple stands just outside the garbhagrha (inner sanctum) of the temple during the two or three daily pūjā rituals performed by the brahmin priests (arccakar, kurukkal).40 At the end of the (sixteen) ceremonial honors (sodasopacāra) extended to the deity during the pūjā,41 the otuvār, in accordance with the injunction of the Agamic ritual manuals, which states: "Then, following the ceremony, there should be singing in the Dravida language,"42 sings two or more selections from the Tirumurai texts. There is a convention, of uncertain date, that at least on especially auspicious days the ōtuvār should sing verses from the Pañcapurānam ("The five poems"), which consists of the Tēvāram, Tiruvācakam, Tiruvicaippā, Tiruppallāntu (from Book XI of the Tirumurai), and Periya purānam. 43 Normally, even in this special performance pride of place is given to the Tēvāram and Tiruvācakam. The Tēvāram singing of the ōtuvār is, as we have seen, part of temple ritual, but it is not tied to ritual contexts alone, nor is it prescribed that a specific song be sung on a specific day. 44 In the freedom of choice, the ōtuvār takes ³⁷ See Chapter 3, note 73 above. The Tamil leaic Cankam is the nucleus of the "Tamil music" movement.

³⁸ It is not clear whether the ōtwārs are a separate subcaste among Tamil Śaivas. Boys from various subcastes train to become ōtwārs. Fuller (Servants of the Goddess, p. 38) says that ōtwārs belong to the Veļļāļar or Saiva Piļļai (Vellala) caste.

¹⁹ The Tarumapuram class I observed was typical in these respects.

⁴⁰ On the hierarchical structure of this arrangement, see Fuller, Servants of the Goddess, pp. 38-39, 47-48.

⁴¹ On these ceremonial honors, see ibid., pp. 12-14.

⁴² Quoted in Dorai Rangaswami, Religion and Philosophy, 1: 4.

⁴³ The Tiruvicaippā and Tiruppallāntu are tenth- and eleventh-century hymns included in Tirumurai IX. Today, as always, the Tēvāram and Tiruvācakam selections continue to be the most popular and well-known pieces.

⁴⁴ However, hymns associated with specific ritual occasions and events in the saints' lives are sung at the appropriate times.

the first step toward freedom of interpretation. The ancient Tamil scale-types (pan) were associated with particular times of day and particular moods; when the classical pan modal system was strictly followed, the choice of hymns must have been guided by the need for singing in the appropriate pan.⁴⁵ Within recent memory, however, the only restriction on the selection of patikams has been that the ōtuvār should sing at least one Tēvāram verse dedicated to Śiva at the particular temple where the performance takes place. Once the ōtuvār has chosen the hymns, he has a choice of styles in which to sing his selections, a choice that, as we shall see below, has interpretive implications.

In singing the Tēvāram, the singer may select two or more verses from a hymn and render them in a set tune developed from a particular raga scale and regulated by a cycle of beats called tāla, sometimes keeping time with hand-cymbals (tālam).46 This rendering is done in a simple, straightforward manner. The ötuvär may attempt a few original grace notes, ornaments, and flourishes, but the basic melody is simple, and the melodic pattern itself has been fixed by tradition and learned by rote. 47 Most devotees know the tunes of the most popular hymns. However, the otuvars also perform the hymns in a sophisticated, free-form, individualized singing style called the viruttam or cuttankam style; the devotee's appreciation of the ōtuvār as a specialist in Tēvāram singing rests largely on the singer's ability to perform in the viruttam style. Appar's hymns in the Tiruviruttam, Tirunëricai, and Tantakam genres (based on the viruttam, nēricai, and tāntakam meters, respectively) are always sung in the viruttam style, in ragas assigned to each genre (rather than to each hymn).48 It is not clear whether the option of singing all of the Tevaram hymns in the viruttam style is an ancient practice or a more recent application of the Tiruviruttam and Tantakam performance style to the entire corpus. 49 Whatever the case may be, the viruttam style itself is considered to have ancient connections with the hymns of the saints, and it is known today as the style that is truly characteristic of Tevaram singing. The uniqueness of both styles of Tēvāram singing in their traditional form is illuminated when we consider them in relation to the style of rendering classical songs

⁴⁵ Particular pans were also associated with particular types and tunings of the yāl. Campantar mentions the time of day in relation to the pan in some of his hymns.

⁴⁶ The nature of rhythm in the hymns is discussed below in this chapter.

⁴⁷ Typical of the oral tradition of learning songs in Indian music. There is no written notation for the Tēvāram, as has been developed for Carnatic song-texts in the last few centuries.

⁴⁸ According to the Tirumuraikanta purāṇam (39), the Tirunēricai and Tiruviruttam songs are to be sung in the pan Kolli. No pan is specified for the Tāṇṭakam genre.

⁴⁹ Interview with Lalgudi Swaminathan, Ötuvār at the Kapālīśvara temple, Mylapore, Madras, July 1978.

62

in Carnatic music, and the influence that the two traditions have had upon each other.

Rāga (melodic framework) and tāla (beat cycle) are standard features of songs in the ancient musical system of India.50 More precisely defined, "A raga is not a tune, nor is it a 'modal' scale, but rather a continuum with scale and tune as its extremes. Many ragas can share the same intervallic structure, that is, the same scale type . . . ; at the same time any number of compositions or improvisations can be in the same raga,"51 Tāla "is not simply rhythm; rather, in the general and abstract sense a tala is a fixed and cyclically repeated time-span for music, articulated into segments by beats of the hand or a percussion idiophone."52 The raga tunes in which the ôtuvārs sing the hymns can be seen as contemporary "equivalents" of the ancient pans, which were Tamil variants of the pan-Indian raga concept, but the use of tāla, a fixed beat cycle on the model of Carnatic music, is a departure from the original conception of the rhythmic aspect of the hymns. In studying the metrical and musical aspects of the Tēvāram songs, we find a critical difference in the way in which text, tune, and rhythm are related in the Carnatic song and the Tēvāram patikam. Whereas in the Carnatic song, a metrical or non-metrical text is "set" to a raga tune and fit into one of a few standardized cyclical beat patterns (tālas),53 the metrical pattern of the Tēvāram patikam itself acted as the rhythmic framework of the hymn; equally important, this metrical pattern also indicated the tune, the melodic mold, in which the line of text would be sung. This coincidence of patterns of meter, tune, and beat in the patikam was called kattalai (rule).54 In the musical (panmurai) systematization of the patikams, the hymns were grouped, first according to their pan and, under each pan, according to kattalai-pattern. For instance, the Tirumuraikanta purānam points out that hymns 1-22 in Book I of the Tevaram are sung in the pan Nattapatai, ⁵⁰ For definitions of rāga, tāla, and other features of Indian music, consult essays I ("The region, its music and music history," pp. 69–91) and II ("Theory and practice of classical music," pp. 91–141) by Harold S. Powers on the music of India, under the entry "India, subcontinent of," in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, edited by Stanley Sadie (London: Macmillan, 1980), 9: 69–141.

⁵¹ Powers, essay II, in New Grove Dictionary, 9: 98.

⁵² Ibid., 9: 118.

⁵⁵ See Peterson, "The kṛti," and Indira V. Peterson, "Sanskrit in Carnatic Music: The Songs of Muttusvāmi Dīkṣita," Indo-Iranian Journal 29 (1986): 183–99.

³⁴ Scholars of Tamil literature and music have a poor understanding of kaṭṭalai. Some assert that it is nothing more than a metrical pattern; others suggest that it is a pattern of beats independent of the meter of the poem Irāmanātan Ceṭṭiyar, ed., Paṇ ārāycciyum, pp. 114ff.). Powers, essay I, in New Grove Dictionary, 9: 75, defines kaṭṭalai more precisely: "they [the Tēvāram hymns] are grouped according to melodic types called paṇ and specific times called kaṭṭalai mould." The rhythmic aspect of kaṭṭalai needs to be clarified. See my suggestions below.

LIVES OF A TEXT

and have eight kaṭṭaļais.⁵⁵ This is just another way of saying that these hymns in a particular paṇ are classified under eight set "tunes" that coincide with eight distinct beat patterns. To this day, ōtuvārs memorize the hymn tunes with the aid of kaṭṭaḷai patterns, and till recently, hand-cymbals (tāḷam) were used to mark out kaṭṭaḷai beat patterns, and not autonomous tāla beat cycles.⁵⁶

The viruttam style of singing the Tēvāram presents a contrast to the kattalai-based style I have just described. The improvisatory technique of viruttam singing is not actually taught to ōtuvār trainees; throughout their student career otuvars listen to creative viruttam performances of the hymns by older otuvars, until they feel ready to perform on their own. The viruttam performance is entirely improvisatory and "free" in terms of melodic form; though the verse is sung in a specific pan or raga, there is no fixed tune or melodic pattern to which the text is "set." The raga functions as no more than a skeletal outline or framework of contours and limits for melodic exploration. In these respects, this technique resembles a type of improvisatory singing that is characteristic of all raga music: the alapana or free-form exposition of a raga.57 There is also a significant difference. The alapana technique of South Indian classical music is concerned with melody alone, whereas the effect of the Tēvāram style depends on the ways in which the "mold" of rhythm, tune, and text is broken. In viruttam singing, there is much improvised ornamentation and asymmetrical repetition of melodic and textual phrases. There is no regular rhythm; the boundaries of tāla and meter are completely ignored.58 The textual line is violated in many ways. The ōtuvār may repeat one line of the verse many times and quickly glide over others. He may dwell on a single word; he may move back and forth among widely separated lines of the text, so that they fall out of their original sequence and rearrange themselves in new ways. A single stanza from a patikam can

⁵⁵ Tirumuraikanta purāņam, verses 33—43. Verse 35: "con nattapātaikkut tokaiy ettuk kattalaiyām."

⁵⁶ In performances of Carnatic music, singers use hand-cymbals only when they sing Tamil devotional hymns.

⁵⁷ On ālāpana or ālāp, the improvisatory technique through which a rāga is elaborated, see Powers, essay II, in New Grove Dictionary, 9: 107ff. Ālāpana is basically "improvisation with the elements of a rāga and within its structural framework," creatively using melodic motifs and "rising and falling phrase types" (p. 107).

⁵⁸ Ālāpana refers only to the exposition of rāga with no text or beat component. In both South and North Indian music, there are various types of melodic and rhythmic improvisation in the context of a composition (nibaddha, lit., dependent), and therefore regulated by tāla (e.g., pallavi and niraval techniques in Carnatic music). Thus the free textual-melodic improvisations of the ōtuvār fall midway between the canonical categories of "dependent" and "independent" melodic improvisation.

thus be elaborated for as long as ten or fifteen minutes.⁵⁹ The entire performance is characterized by freedom of expression and discursiveness enlivened by a sense of drama.

The specific function of improvisation in Tēvāram singing must be examined in the context of the history and associations of the word viruttam in Tamil poetry. Viruttam is the Tamil form of Sanskrit vrtta, a term used in Sanskrit for meter in general and especially for meters based on the number of syllables in a line (aksara or "syllabic" meters), as opposed to those based on the duration of syllables in the line ("moric" meters. measured in mātrā or syllabic instants).60 In Tamil poetry the term viruttam was first used to designate a variety of meters that developed out of earlier classical meters such as kali and akaval. 61 The new meters, though basically governed by the rules of classical Tamil prosody, were also influenced by Sanskrit prosodic principles.62 The Nayanars and Alvar poets were the first Tamil poets to make extensive use of these so-called Viruttam or supplementary meters.63 From the tenth century on, the term viruttam has been specifically applied to a particular type of meter that became the standard vehicle for narrative poetry, especially epics and Puranas, in Tamil.64 Thus historically the Tamil word viruttam, when applied to a metrical form, has been associated with Sanskrit meter and Sanskrit narrative and lyric poetic genres (kāvya) as well as with Tamil devotional hymns.

To understand the application of the term viruttam to a style of singing, we must turn to musical performance styles in the musical- and dancedrama traditions of South India, in which epic and mythological plots are retold or enacted; to folk as well as classical forms, ranging from the stylized Yakṣagāna of Karnataka to the Terukkūttu "street drama" of Tamilnadu. 65 Although these dramatic musical traditions differ from each ³º An elderly afficionado of Tēvāram singing told me that he had heard ötuvārs elaborate a verse for as long as half an hour.

⁶⁰ For definitions of these meters in Sanskrit poetry, see V. S. Apte, The Practical Sanskrit-English Dictionary, 3rd ed., rev. and enl. (Delhi: Motilal Banarsidass, 1965), app. I (Sanskrit Prosody).

⁶¹ Kamil Žvelebil, Tamil Literature, in A History of Indian Literature, ed. Jan Gonda, vol. X, fasc. 1 (Wiesbaden: Otto Harrassowitz, 1974), p. 97.

⁶² Ibid., pp. 101, 105, 108-19. See Chapter 5 below.

⁶³ A. Chidambaranatha Chettiar, Advanced Studies in Tamil Prosody (Annamalainagar: Annamalai University, 1977), pp. 115-21.

⁴⁴ E.g., the Periya puranam and Kampan's (thirteenth century?) Iramavataram,

⁶⁵ Other genres include the Kuṭiyāṭṭam of Kerala, the Telugu-Tamil Bhāgavatameļa, and the Tamil Nāṭakak Kirtṭaṇai. On these types of theater, see Kapila Vatsyayan, Traditional Indian Theater: Multiple Streams (New Delhi: National Book Trust, 1980) and Balwant Gargi, Folk Theater of India (Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1966).

other in important ways, they are similar in their employment of both fixed and "free" recitative and musical styles in the rendering of the songtexts that accompany the dance and mime. 66 Songs that are replete with tāla and fixed melodic patterns alternate with lyric stanzas that are sung or recited, either entirely in free form—i.e., without observing rhythmic boundaries—or at least in a style sharply differentiated in rhythm and structure from the other songs. In these regional dramatic traditions, both the stanzaic form and the style in which such stanzas are sung is known as viruttam. According to Balwant Gargi, the viruttam form is used in these dramatic genres primarily for narration.67 His description of the occurrence of the viruttam style in the Terukküttu ("Street drama") of Tamilnadu is representative: "The chanting (virutham) precedes every song. . . . The virutham is usually set in the same raga as the song and leads to the next situation in the play. The singer chants the words to underline the meaning, sums up the situation, and makes the audience understand clearly the progress of the story. This breaks the monotony of the singing."68 Also, these viruthams are "verses without rhythmic beats, half chanting, half singing, like the alaap [Carnatic ālāpana] of a classical melody."69 The alternation of snappy, highly structured songs with slower, unstructured melodic performance that unfolds "in slow motion, like the rising of smoke"70-or, as one writer suggests in explaining the name of one of Appar's hymn-types (Nëricai), "like the continuous and flowing humming of bees"71—makes for a sharp contrast in texture, a change of pace, a momentary pause in the action. In the folk theater, it is the narrative associations of the viruttam meter (Sanskrit vrtta, itivrtta, vrttanta all mean event, narration) that predominate, and the viruttam portions of the performance are used mainly for narrative purposes. Again, though the viruttam verses are performed at a slower tempo, in the context of the play they function as straightforward, highly compressed summaries of "events" and information, turning our attention to the themes and actions, which are then elaborated and interpreted in a leisurely manner in the songs that follow. This stylistic contrast in the musical drama is probably traceable to the influence of the Sanskrit Gitagovinda (twelfth century), the earliest known dramatic-musical poem, in which kāvya-style lyric stanzas are placed at the beginning of cycles of [&]quot;See Gargi, Folk Theater, chs. 8, 9.

⁶⁷ Ibid., pp. 158-59.

⁶⁸ Ibid., p. 136.

⁶⁹ Ibid.

⁷⁰ Ibid.

⁷¹ Vellaivāraņan, Panniru tirumurai varalāru, p. 410.

songs composed in musical "moric" meters and set to $r\bar{a}gas$. In the $G\bar{i}$ -tagovinda the kävya verses "function as independent grammatical and esthetic entities. Most of them are narrative verses identifying the singer of a song or elaborating its context."

Which of the characteristics and functions of the viruttam style are featured in the ötuvār's performance? The stanza sung in viruttam style certainly creates a change in the tempo and texture of the Tēvāram performance. Yet, although a verse in this free style does function as a pause, it rarely has narrative connotations. The ōtuvār does not compress or summarize a body of information in the viruttam; instead, he explores and expands the stanzaic microcosm. Far from urging us to move on to the next song, he invites us to dwell on, to savor, every word and phrase in the viruttam text. The nonlinear elaboration of the text, with its complex repetitions, disposes words and meanings in ever-changing patterns, like fragments of colored glass in a kaleidoscope. In these respects the viruttam verse in a Tēvāram performance is like the few kāvya verses in the Gītagovinda which are "relatively independent of the story and serve primarily to reinforce the esthetic atmosphere of the poem. Such verses may be recalled and enjoyed like miniature paintings from an album,"⁷⁴

In the context of the Tēvāram, the viruttam style is more closely related to the religious stotra verse in Sanskrit than to the epic or narrative stanza. This is borne out in the performance tradition of Carnatic music today, in which the hymns of the Tēvāram and Tiruvācakam and Sanskrit stotra stanzas (called culokam, from Sanskrit śloka, "a verse") are the only lyric texts that are performed without tāla, in the elaborate viruttam style. In Tēvāram performances, the viruttam style has devotional and aesthetic functions; it has a deeply reflective, expansive, trance-inducing quality, and it is an essentially interpretive style.

My experience of several viruttam-style performances of the patikams by $\bar{o}tuv\bar{a}rs$ leads me to believe that the $\bar{o}tuv\bar{a}r's$ selection, his repetitions and rearrangements of the text, his elaboration and ornamentation of particular lines and phrases in text and melody, all constitute his interpretation of the text—in his role of religious professional and artist—and help reveal particular aspects and nuances of the hymn to his audience of devotees. In the context of the $p\bar{u}j\bar{a}$ ritual, with its constraints of time and hierarchy, the $\bar{o}tuv\bar{a}r's$ viruttam singing tends to be prefunctory. In festival processions, the $\bar{o}tuv\bar{a}r's$ viruttam singing tends to be prefunctory and processions, the $\bar{o}tuv\bar{a}r's$ viruttam singing tends to be prefunctory.

² See Barbara Stoler Miller, Love Song of the Dark Lord: Jayadeva's Gītagovinda (New York: Columbia University Press, 1977).

⁷³ Miller, Love Song, introd., p. 9.

⁷⁴ Ibid.

LIVES OF A TEXT

like them, contributes to the general din and spectacle that characterize such events. Here the ōtuvārs sing in groups of two or more, sometimes in unison, sometimes adopting an antiphonal style; the rhythmically and melodically bound song form is more suitable than the viruttam for this group singing. It is in "public" performances of the Tēvāram, outside of the context of pūjā, that the viruttam style comes into its own. Like the pan-Indian Paurānika who narrates and interprets stories from the sacred epics and Purānas in public places, and especially in the temple, the otuvār in Tamil Siva temples regularly sings the Tēvāram hymns in the capacity of a specialist-performer of sacred texts. In twentieth-century practice, in the more prosperous and prominent Siva temples in Tamilnadu, the ōtuvār may be found seated, of an evening, on a porch (mantapam) or courtyard of the temple, giving a leisurely rendering of hymn texts, mainly in the viruttam style.75 In such a performance the ōtuvār, like the Purana narrator (Pauranika) or temple dancer, becomes a truly creative religious artist.

An Ötuvär Performance

To give an idea of the nature of the ōtuvār's performance of the Tēvāram hymns, a brief description and analysis follows of a performance of Nānacampanta Ōtuvār of the Caṭṭainātar Śiva temple at Cīrkāli, birthplace of the Nāyaṇār Campantar, and shrine to which the saint dedicated over seventy hymns. With the singer's permission, I recorded this informal performance at the Cīrkāli temple in July 1978. Nāṇacampanta Ōtuvār (see illus. 14) had finished his ritual duties for the morning pūjā and was seated on the temple porch, singing hymns from the Tēvāram, as some devotees casually strolled by, and others gathered around him to listen. Of the ten selections he sang over a forty-minute period, four were in the viruttam style.

In my translation of Nāṇacampanta Ōtuvār's viruttam selections, given below, I have marked and underlined phrases and lines that the performer highlighted through repetition, musical ornamentation, and other stylistic strategies. For one selection, Appar VI.301.1 ("vāṇavaṇ kāṇ"), I have given a detailed analysis of performance style and emphases. Square brackets indicate particular emphasis, which involves a great deal of repetition and musical ornamentation, and connections not found in the text. The italicized lines and phrases were repeated and ornamented as units.

⁷⁵ These texts consist of the Tēvāram, Tiruvācakam, and the Tiruppukal of the fifteenth-century Murukan devotee Arunakirinātar.

1,
If you ask:
"What is the town
of him who holds the battle-axe in his hand?" the answer is:
"Kalumalam, where flags flutter on the gateways of tall mansions, this great town
where herons gather in canals in the fields, and bees, drunk on honey from their beloveds' lips, cling to every flowering palm."

Appar IV.83.176

2.
[This Tōṇipuram,] beautiful with [enduring life, and grandeur, and justice,] [once floated] on the rising waves of the cosmic flood—
The flower-[feet of Kalumalam's Lord] who burned the triple city with his arrow rule us forever.

Appar IV.82.677

3a.
[My Lord who is ambrosia to me,]
the Lord who is dear to all who seek him, he who holds fire in his hand, skullbearer who flayed the huge killer elephant,] god with the poison-stained throat, is the great god who lives in Piramapuram of fragrant groves.

Campantar II.176.178

"6 The repeated phrases are as follows: maţaivāyk kurukiṇam, "herons in canals in the fields"; pāļai piritorum, "on every flowering palm"; vanṭiṇankal peṭaivāy matuvunṭu, "bees, drunk on honey from their beloved's lips"; pērātirukkum, "cling"; perum patiyē, "great town."

"Repeated phrases: it tōṇipuram, "this Tōṇipuram"; nilaiyum perumaiyum nītiyum, "enduring life, and grandeur, and justice"; cāla aļakum uṭaittāy, "having much beauty [beautiful]"; anţu mitanta, "once floated"; nantammai ālvanavē, "rule us."

Repeated phrases: empirān enakkamutam āvānum, "my Lord who is ambrosia to me"; tannatamtār tampirān, "the Lord who is dear to all who seek him"; kampamā kariy uritta kāpāli, "skullbearer who flayed the huge killer elephant."

3b.

He who gives blessings to his devotees,
the Lord who is the ultimate truth,
the king who dwells in stone-walled Piramapuram—[Campantan] once attained him.
[Those who know these ten verses] of the poet are blessed,
and [will have riches,] and [enjoyment of every kind.]

Campantar II.176.11?

In the following more detailed analysis of Appar VI.301.1 ("vāṇavaṇ kāṇ" [Poem 20], a Tāṇṭakam verse dedicated to the shrine at Civapuram), three versions are given: (a) a free translation, (b) a literal translation, with text; and (c) a transcription, with translation, of the rendering by Nāṇacampanta Ōtuvār in July 1978. There are minor differences between (b) and (c) in the Tamil; these occur because the Tamil in (b) follows the printed text, and the Tamil in (c) follows the rendering I recorded by Nāṇacampanta Ōtuvār. Punctuation in the Tamil text is my own. Roman numerals indicate the beginning of clauses or sentences in the Tamil text, most of which cross the boundary of the Tamil metrical "line." Arabic numerals in (b) indicate the beginning of "lines" in the four-line stanza.

4A. FREE TRANSLATION

I See the god!

II See him who is higher than the gods!

[See him who is Sanskrit of the North and southern Tamil and the four Vedas!]

IV See him who bathes in milk and ghee,

v vi see the Lord, see him who dances, holding fire, in the wilderness of the burning-ground,

⁷⁹ Repeated phrases: campantan, "Campantan"; molipattum ivai vallār, "those who know these ten verses"; ponnațaintār, "will have riches"; pökankal palav ațaintār, "will have enjoyment of every kind"; punniyarē, "they are blessed."

VII

see him who blessed the hunter-saint!

VIII

[See him who wells up as honey in the heart-lotus of his lovers!]

iΧ

[See him who has the unattainable treasure!]

х х

[See Śiva!] See [him who is our treasure here in Civapuram!]

4B. TEXT AND LITERAL TRANSLATION

ī

1 vänavan kän; vänavarkku mēlānān kän; The sky-dweller see; him gods-higher-than-who-is, see; vaṭamoliyun tenramilu maraika nānkum the northern language, southern Tamil and the Vedas four,

Ш

IV

2 āṇavaṇ kāṇ; āṇaintum āṭināṇ kāṇ; him-who-is, see; in the five (products) of the cow, who bathes, see aiyan kān; kaiyil analēnti āṭum the Lord, see; in-hand fire-holding, who dances,

7 10

VII

3 kāṇavan kāṇ; kāṇavanukk aruļ ceytān kān; him of the burning-ground wild, see; to the hunter, who granted grace, him see; karutuvār itayattuk kamalatt' ūrum those who love (him), in their heart-lotuses welling up as

VIII

IX

4 tēṇavaṇ kāṇ; ceṇraṭaiyāc celvaṇrāṇ kāṇ; honey, him see; the unattainable treasure who holds, him see;

x xı civan avan kān; civapuratten celvanrānē Śiva, him see; in Civapuram, him who is our treasure, that very one.

4c. TRANSCRIPTION

- 1. vāṇavaṇ kāṇ. See the god.
- 11. vāṇavarkku mēlāṇāṇ kāṇ. See him who is higher than the gods.
- 111. vaţamoliyun ten ramilu maraika nankum anavan kan. See him who is Sanskrit of the North and southern Tamil and the four Vedas.
- III. vaṭamoliyun ten . . . nānkum ānavan kān. See him who is Sanskrit . . . and the four Vedas.
- IV. anaintum atinan kan. See him who bathes in milk and ghee.
- v. and vi. aiyan kān; kaiyil anal ēnti āṭum kānavan kān. See the Lord. See him who dances, holding fire, in the wilderness of the burning-ground.
- VII. kāṇavaṇukk aruļ ceytāṇ kāṇ. See him who blessed the hunter-saint.
- VIIIa. karutuvār ... Of his lovers, ...
- VIIIb. itayattu ... in the heart, ...
- VIIIc. kamalattu ürum tēṇavaṇ kāṇ . . . in the lotus, who wells up as honey, him see.
 - VIII. karutuvār itayattuk kamalatt' ūrum tēņavaņ kāņ. See him who, in the heart-lotus of his lovers, wells up as honey.
 - ix. cenru ațaiyac celvanran kan. See him who has the unattainable treasure.
 - IX. centu ațaiyac celvanțan kan. See him who has the unattainable treasure.
 - x. civan avan kān. See Siva.
 - XI. civapurattu en celvançane. See him who is our treasure here in Civapuram.
 - IX. cenru ațaiyac celvanran kan. See him who has the unattainable treasure.
 - XI. civapurattu en celvanganē. See him who is our treasure here in Civapuram.
 - III. vaṭamoliyun tenramilu maraika ṇānkum āṇavan kāṇ. See him who is Sanskrit of the North and southern Tamil and the four Vedas.
 - XI. civapurattu en celvanțăne. See him who is our treasure here in Civapuram.
 - VIII. karutuvār itayattuk kamalatt' ūrum tēnavan kān. See him in the heart-lotus of his lovers, wells up as honey.
 - IX. cenru ațaiyac celvanran kan. See him who has the unattainable treasure.
 - x. civan avan kāņ. See Siva.

72

XI. civapurattu en celvangane. See him who is our treasure here in Civapuram, that very one.

In each of their hymns, the three poet-saints of the Tēvāram focus on particular aspects of the range of Tamil Saiva religious themes that are articulated in their poetry. In his performance the ötuvār brings out the nuances of these selected images. In different selections, Nanacampanta Otuvar dwelt upon and highlighted different themes from the hymns: the grace of Siva ("the flower-feet"; selection 2); the heroic deeds of Siva ("the skullbearer who flayed the huge killer elephant," 3a); local myths ("This Tonipuram . . . once floated on the . . . cosmic flood," 2); akam landscapes ("where herons gather in canals in the fields," 1). Of all the pieces that he rendered in the viruttam style, the ōtuvār performed Appar's "vāṇavan kāṇ" (selection 4) with the highest degree of stylistic elaboration. "Vānavan kān" is the first verse of a patikam in the long Tamil tantakam meter, of which Appar was one of the earliest and best exponents; hymns in this meter are usually sung in the viruttam style.80 As is typical of Appar's Tantakam verses, "vanavan kan" consists of a series of relatively short sentences. The verse also contains a concentration of major Tēvāram themes. In his rendering of this hymn, through such strategies as the repetition of entire phrases, melodic ornamentation, rhythm changes, and alteration of the sequence of "lines," Nanacampanta Ōtuvar chose to highlight four themes: those embodied in lines III, VIII, IX, and x1 in the transcription. What motivated the particular emphases in this performance? The creative fantasy of the artist? The demands of an ancient musical tradition and style? A devotee's response to the saint's lyrics? Though each of these factors contributed to the singer's selection, the overarching consideration was his task, as a religious artist, of fulfilling the expectations of his religious community and tradition.

As I listened to Nāṇacampanta Ōtuvār and others like him, in temples and homes and concert halls, the role of the ōtuvār in the transmission of the meanings of the Tēvāram hymns became increasingly clear to me. In the singer's unique rendering of such songs as "vāṇavaṇ kāṇ," I saw a subtle balance between artistic virtuosity and the spirit of bhakti; between the creative artist's freedom of interpretation and the religious specialist's veneration of the intended meanings in the saint's song. Patterns of audience response, the devotee's perceptions of the ōtuvār's singing, and the ōtuvār's own view of it all contribute to our understanding of the specialist's performance.

⁵⁰ See my discussion of meter in the Tevaram hymns in Chapter 5 below.

He who can recite these ten verses and listen to them will wipe his life clean of sorrow. Campantar I.105.11

Like the Rāmāyaṇa and other popular sacred texts of Hinduism, the Tēvāram hymns command from their "readers" absolute faith in the power and efficacy of the text as an instrument of devotion. The signature verses of the Tamil hymns are particularly influential in that their description of the transformative, experiential power of the hymns is ascribed to the saints themselves and not to the anonymous "tradition." Although no canonical distinction is made between the devotee's recitation of the Tēvāram in private worship and his listening to the hymns when performed by ōtuvārs in ritual and informal contexts, there is a felt difference in the two experiences.

As the performer of a sacred text, especially of a "Veda," the otuvar takes great pains to enunciate clearly and to render faithfully the words of the Navanars. Yet unlike the non-specialist devotee, the religious artist feels free, indeed compelled, to rearrange the text and to render it with varying highlights in every performance. The ōtuvārs are largely unacquainted with the intricacies of Tamil Saiva theological and philosophical texts. They confine their expertise to an avowedly nonintellectual, artistic appreciation and interpretation of the Tirumurai, the primary texts of the tradition. As one otuvar put it, "I am not a scholar; all I know are the words of the saints."82 What do the ōtuvārs see as their primary function? In the words of Lalgudi Swaminathan, the ōtuvār of Kapālīśvara temple in Madras, "To render faithfully the words of the saints; to serve at the pūjā ritual."83 Whether he sings the hymns in pre-set melodies and rhythms or in the freer viruttam style, the ōtuvār sees his performance as being "faithful to the words of the saints," and himself as the vehicle or medium for those words. The audience of devotees shares in this view.

Despite the efforts of such organizations as the Tamil leai Cańkam to play up the merits of Tēvāram singing as a musical genre worthy of the "secular" concert stage, the majority of listeners at a Tirumurai public concert tend to be the same devout Tamil Śaivas who listen to the ōtuvār

³¹ Some scholars are of the opinion that the phalasruti verses in the Tēvāram hymns were not written by the saints themselves, but added later by the "tradition." Yet the final verses in Campantar's and Cuntarar's poems seem too full of enigmatic autobiographical details, and too distinctive in style, to be attributed to others. In any case, the "tradition" views the words as the saints' own.

¹² Nanacampanta Otuvar, Cattainatar temple, Cîrkali. Personal interview, July 1978.

⁸³ Personal interview, July 1978.

at the temple.⁸⁴ In contrast with the classical (Carnatic) concert, there are no purely musical high points in the Tēvāram concert. Just as the Tēvāram singer's embellishments and emphases call attention to particular nuances of religious meaning in the text, his audience responds to evocative, moving words and passages with the sort of noises of appreciation and excitement largely reserved for musically exciting moments in the Carnatic concert. The contrast is further heightened in the context of the current linguistic situation in Carnatic music in Tamilnadu, where the majority of the audience does not understand Telugu, the principal language of the Carnatic song repertoire, and therefore cannot respond to shades of meaning and poetic excellence in the lyrics.⁸⁵

The Tamil Saiva audience perceives the ōtuvār as a medium, in a certain sense, a mediator between the text and itself, rather than as a virtuoso artist. It responds to the performance, rather than to the performer. Listeners more often speak of "a moving rendering" than of "a great singer." In such a view, the ōtuvār is seen as a "good" performer when the audience feels that, through creative selection and foregrounding as well as through a "moving" rendering, he has revealed hidden meanings and subtle beauties in the saints' hymns that are by reputation beautiful and rich in devotional themes. Nevertheless, the fact remains that, even as my own response to Appar's "vāṇavan kāṇ" will forever be associated with Nānacampanta Ötuvär's moving performance of that verse one summer morning in Cīrkāli, the unique interpretations of particular hymns by individual singers surely color and shape the contemporary Tamil Saiva devotee's understanding of the hymns. It is in this sense that the ōtuvār, just as much as the commentator or philosopher, is an "interpreter" of the tradition. That the Tamil Saivas deeply value this least pretentious ³⁴ This is certainly the case at the festival of Tamil music (in particular, Tamil hymn music) organized annually by the Tamil Icaic Cankam. I attended the festival in December 1979–January 1980 and recorded several performances of Tamil bhakti hymns by ōtuvārs and others. The majority of the audience at the Tēvāram concerts were Tamil Śaiva devotees.

William J. Jackson has pointed out, in his recent thesis on Tyagaraja, that this composer's Telugu songs evoke a unique kind of religio-aesthetic response based on "glossolalia," the adoption of a tongue other than one's own for purposes of worship, aesthetic experience, etc. In Jackson's view the combination of "simple" bhakti lyrics and a sophisticated "foreign" language (Telugu) (associated with the court and arts) in Tyagaraja's kṛtis create the kind of experience that Tamil Hindus associate with religious texts in "other" languages 'especially Sanskrit)—a sense of mystery, dignity, and awe, here united with the intimate and comforting lyricism of bhakti. William J. Jackson, "Tyagaraja: Musician Saint of South India" (Ph.D. diss., Harvard University, 1984), p. 167. I suggest that the Tamil listener's experience of the Nayanar's hymns is based on quite a different "religious" experience of language: the comforting, enveloping intimacy of one's mother tongue, quite devoid of the distancing "mystery" associated with religious texts in other tongues.

and most directly appealing of interpreters speaks for the continuing importance of the experience and expression of devotional love in Tamil Šaiva religion. The themes and values of this tradition, and its very conception of the ideal religious experience, are communicated and reaffirmed in every sensitive performance of the $T\bar{e}v\bar{a}ram$ hymns.

On Translating the Hymns

Poem, Stanza, Song

The Tevaram hymns are among the earliest examples of the stanzaic song (patikam) in Tamil. When the poets call their songs pattu ("ten"), they are referring to the hymn as a sequence of ten four-line stanzas in a single meter. The poems of the early Cankam anthologies (tokai) vary greatly in length and, in fact, were grouped together on the basis of length as well as subject matter.1 The shortest of these poems, all of which are in the akaval meter, are found in the Ainkurunūru ("Five Hundred Short Poems"; poems of 3-6 lines) and Kuruntokai ("Anthology of Short Poems"; poems of 4-8 lines) anthologies. A certain resemblance to the patikam format may be seen in the grouping together of some of these poems in "tens" (pattu) on the basis of thematic similarity; however, though some of these groups of ten contain formulaic phrases that function as a refrain, each poem is considered to be a self-sufficient entity, an autonomous piece.2 The detached stanzaic form came into vogue in Tamil in the descriptive and didactic literature produced by late classical authors,3 many of whom were Jain and therefore familiar with Sanskrit literature, in which the stanza of four padas or quarters ("lines") is the standard poetic form. The venpā, a short stanza which in its four-line variety is similar to the four-line stanzaic poems of Sanskrit kāvya poetry, became the most popular form with late classical writers of independent short poems.4 This type of stanzaic poetry lacks the musical (icai) associ-

¹ The poems of the Cankam age, regardless of their length, are unitary in nature. Even the longest poem is considered to be no more than a single stanza and often consists of one or two sentences. Such poems are called tanippāṭal, "the solitary stanza (or poem)." Zvelebil, Tamil Literature, 1974, p. 7.

² Zvelebil calls the combination of classical poems in anthologies such as the Ainkurunūru "thematic cycles," Ibid., p. 7n.

From the third-fourth centuries on. E.g., the Tirukkural of Tiruvalluvar (ca. A.D. 400?) and the Nālatīyār, The Great Quatrains) (A.D. 750?), compiled by Patumaṇār. See Zvelebil, Tamil Literature, 1974, pp. 117-27.

^{*} For a prosodic description of the compa meter, see Hart, Poems, pp. 199-201.

ations of the Tēvāram hymns.5 The early Śaiva and Vaiṣṇava bhakti saints, such as Kāraikkāl Ammaiyār, were the first poets to compose longer poems by linking venpā and other stanza types.6

The closest analogues to the patikam in terms of meter and form can be found in some of the songs (icaip pāṭṭu) embedded in the late classical (fifth century?) epic Cilappatikāram (The Epic of the Anklet), written by the poet Iļankōvaṭikaļ, who is ṣaid to have been a Cēra prince who became a Jain monk. The themes and titles of these songs—"Āycciyar kuravai" ("The Kuravai Song and Dance of the Herdswomen"), "Kāṇal vari" ("The Vari Songs of the Seashore"), "Vēṭṭuva vari" ("Song and Dance of the Hunters")—suggest that they have their origins in folk-song and dance forms. Most of the Cilappatikāram songs consist of four-line stanzas that have a regular, musical beat and are linked to their neighbors by a refrain. The structural organization of these stanzaic groups is different from that of the patikam: the "Kāṇal vari," for instance, consists of a number of short "songs," each composed of two to four stanzas in a single meter, with a refrain. Some of the Cilappatikāram stanzas have metrical patterns very similar to those of the Tēvāram hymns.

Music and Meter

Classical Tamil prosody is based on the rhythmic combination and disposition of vocalic elements in the line (ați) of verse. ¹⁰ It can be described, in a qualified sense, as a time-oriented, rather than a stress-based or syllabic prosody. English and Sanskrit prosody are examples of the latter types. In Tamil verse, the basic metrical unit is the acai (lit., "movement"), which is of two types: nēr, simple metrical unit, a single long or ⁵ Although some meters can be chanted in a singsong "tune." The Tēvāram saints themselves call their hymns icait tamil (musical Tamil verse). The majority of the Cańkam poems and the verses of the didactic anthologies belong to the category of iyal (literature, poetry). Of the late classical meters, the kali and paripāṭal meters are said to have musical associations. See S. Subrahmanyan, The Commonness in the Metre of the Dravidian Languages, Research Project Publication no. 22 (Trivandrum: Dravidian Linguistics Association, 1977), p. 305.

⁶ On the Tamil Pirapantam genre (Sanskrit Prabandha), see Zvelebil, Tamil Literature, 1974, pp. 193–219. According to Zvelebil, Pirapantams are different from anthologies of independent stanzas by virtue of "internal cohesion and connectedness, either formal or based on unity of content," p. 193.

⁷ Subrahmanyan, Commonness in Metre, p. 306 lists these song types found in late classical works.

⁸ Cilappatikāram 1.7; verses 2–4, 5–7, 8–10, 11–13, 14–16, 17–19, 20–22, 25–27, 28–30, 31–32, etc.

⁹ These are varieties of the kali meter. See Chidambaranatha Chettiar, Advanced Studies, pp. 98-129.

¹⁰ In my description of Tamil meter, I have followed Zvelebil, Smile of Murugan, app. 3, p. 275. See also Hart, Poems, ch. 8.

short syllable (represented by =); and nirai, compound metrical unit, made up of two short syllables, or a short followed by a long syllable (or , here represented by =).11 These metrical units combine in various permutations to form the foot (cir). In the classical meters, given these basic guidelines, there can be great variation in the combination of acais in a line, as long as the combined syllabic length or duration of the feet remains constant: this means that, within a foot, simple and compound units (and =) may be substituted for each other, which results in varying rhythmic patterns for the line. As George Hart points out, this is in contrast to the standard syllabic meters of classical Sanskrit poetry, in which "the length of the line is determined by the number of syllables it contains, not by the number of time units, or syllabic instants in it, as in Tamil."12 Indeed, in the classical Sanskrit meters, not only is the number of syllables in each line (pāda, "quarter") of the stanza specified, the length of each syllable and its position in the verse are also prescribed, thus rendering the rhythmic pattern of the entire stanza constant. This last feature had important implications for the patikam genre.

The majority of the new meters of the Tēvāram are variations on the many "supplemental" meters that evolved out of the classical Tamil meters. Such meters are formed by adding auxiliary members consisting of feet in particular acai combinations to basic metrical types. It is in bhakti poetry that we see these meters being used extensively and, in the case of the Tēvāram, almost exclusively. Comparing the Tēvāram poems with earlier poetry, we find that the main differences between the patikam and earlier verse are: the adoption of the stanza with four lines of equal length as the basic unit and standard form, even within larger structural frameworks (the entire hymn); and the use of a fixed basic pattern of feet, and therefore, beat, for all four lines. Both phenomena reflect a general trend in Tamil poetry, attributable in part to the influence of Sanskrit poetry and in part to the requirements of musical verse. The Nāyaṇārs modi-

i) In both kinds of metrical units, the syllable may be followed by a consonant. See Zvelebil, Smile of Murugan, p. 275.

¹² Hart, Poems, p. 201.

¹¹ See Chidambaranatha Chettiat, Advanced Studies, chs. 11-16.

¹⁴ Ibid., ch. 16. Vellaivāraņaņ, Panņiru tirumurai varalāru, pp. 428-38.

As noted earlier, the stanzaic poems of the Cankam anthologies varied in length. In the Culappatikaram, the stanzaic songs rarely exceed three or four stanzas and are placed within the larger framework of the verse narrative in the akaval meter. In the bhakti hymns, for the first time we find larger structural entities that are composed entirely of identical stanzaic units. The use of symmetrical or near-symmetrical patterns in the four lines is a gradual development that reaches its peak in the Murukan hymns of the fifteenth-century poet Arunakirinatar. "Now a poem has, in addition to the basic prosodic properties of Tamil metres, also the cantam [Sanskrit chandas, meter] or a rigidly set pattern of rhythm based on syllabic quantity." [Zvelebil, Tamil Literature, 1974, p. 109]. In Arunakiri's Tiruppukal hymns the line itself is organized into feet that are rhythmically identical (except the last foot of the line), while the lines have an absolutely identical rhythm, with no substitutions (of two fied the regular beat patterns of Tamil song (icai, music) traditions such as those exemplified in the Cilappatikāram and adapted classical "poetic" meters to create their new song genre. It is only appropriate that the traditional concern regarding the meters of the Tēvāram has not been to classify or identify them as subvarieties of "poetic" meters but to associate these metrical patterns with the specific melodic and rhythmic patterns to which the hymns are to be sung.

Meter, melody, and rhythm converge in the kaṭṭalai pattern or "rule" of each hymn. The pattern of feet in a line of Tēvāram verse is identical with the metrical aspect of the kaṭṭalai, and has a fixed tune. In purely metrical terms, when we scan a Tēvāram verse we find that the feet are distributed in a regular rhythmic pattern in the four lines, which creates a measured musical beat: 17

This verse is composed of four six-foot lines of thirteen acais per line; except the final foot, all the feet have two acais. 18 The basic rhythmic pattern (kaṭṭaļai) or "rule" of the entire hymn can be discerned by scanning the first line of this or any other verse in this patikam.

Alliteration, Rhyme, and Refrain

The tunes of the Tēvāram hymns are not the only aspect of these songs that must remain "unheard" melodies for those who read them in translation; the songs are also rich in soundplay of many kinds. The Nāyaṇārs inherited two basic types of conventions of repetition of sound from clas-shorts for a long, or vice versa). See Zvelebil, Smile of Murugan, app. 2, p. 280, for an illustration of cantam in Tamil poetry. Campantar occasionally uses metrical forms in which the four-line standard is not observed. See my discussion of alliteration below.

¹⁶ See my discussion of kattalai in Chapter 4 above.

¹⁷ Within certain conventional limits, the combination of nēr and nirai in the acais that make up a foot in the classical poems can vary greatly from line to line. In general, the classical poems employ lines of equal number of feet, but here too, variation is possible. As pointed out by the Tamil poeticians, not only the number of acais but the number of "letters" (eluttu) in the kaṭṭalai line is fixed. The parallelism of the lines themselves, combined with the symmetrical or near-symmetrical patterns of feet in the four lines, creates an overall effect of regularity that distinguishes the Tēvāram verses from their predecessors.

¹⁸ The final foot, made up of three acais, is called vencir.

sical Tamil poetry: moṇai, in which the initial sound (vowel or consonant) of a line is repeated at the beginning of another foot within the same line; and etukai, in which the second consonant, syllable, and sometimes a cluster of syllables of two or more lines are identical. Etukai, or second-syllable rhyme, became a regular marker of line boundaries in the Tēvāram songs. In the Campantar verse quoted above, the etukai, moṇai pattern of the four lines is as follows:

- 1 enaitto ruliy ațiya rettav imaiyor perumanar
- 2 ninaittut toluvār pāvan tīrkkum nimalar ugaikoyil
- 3 kanaitta meti kana tayan kaimmer kulaluta
- 4 anaittuñ cenru tiraluñ caral anna malaiyare

Enaitt-, ninaitt-, kanaitt-, and anaittu- form the etukai. Mõnai patterns of many varieties can be found in a single line of verse, as here. The alliteration between e and ē in line 1, and ni- and ni- in line 2 fulfill the requirement of mōṇai. In line 2, in addition to ni- ni-, there is initial alliteration in toluvār and tīrkkum; in line 3, kaṇaitta alliterates with kāṇātu, kaimmēr, and kuļal; and in line 4, cenru and cāral, as well as aṇaittuñ and aṇṇāmalai, provide mōṇai designs. A consideration of the first two lines of Campantar I.10.1 reveals the complexity of sound patterning that can be achieved even in the shorter meters of the Tēvāram:

Identically numbered elements above are identical in sound. In longer meters such as the tānṭakam, the alliterative patterns can be even more complex, crossing line boundaries and extending over the entire stanza; Appar's "vāṇavaṇ kāṇ" (VI.301.1; Poem 20), analyzed in Chapter 4, is a good example of alliteration in tānṭakam verse.

Besides its obvious musical quality, alliteration in the Nāyaṇārs' songs is often used to create interplay of meaning and subtle affective undercur-

¹⁸ Etukai and monai patterns are catalogued in manuals of poetics. For a detailed list, see Subrahmanyan. Commonness in Metre, pp. 326–35. Etukai and monai are a standard feature of all kinds of literary forms in Tamil. E.g., "karka kacatarak karpavai karrapin/nirka atarkut taka". Tirukkurai 391) and the proverb "māmiyār uṭaittāl maṇkuṭam/marumakaļ utairtāl poṇkutam."

rents. The first two lines of Campantar's II.148.1 (Poem 15) provides a good illustration of this phenomenon:

- 1 magaiyānai mācilāp puncatai malkuven
- 2 piraiyānaip pennotā nākiya pemmānai

[My heart can think of nothing other than] the brahmin who is the Veda, he who bears the white moon on his pure, matted red hair, the Lord who is both man and woman

Maraiyāṇai, the first word in the verse, is related by alliteration to mācilā, which is properly an adjective qualifying puṇcaṭai ("matted red hair"). The alliterative link between ma and mā resonates with connections in meaning as well: marai, "Veda" (hence maraiyāṇ: "Veda-chanter," "god who is [in] the Veda") has connotations of ritual purity and the sacred that are carried over to mācilā ("flawless," "pure"), thus emphasizing the identity of Śiva, the matted-hair ascetic, as the pure god of the Vedas and their ritual universe. The varied, staggered repetition of words and lines in the ōtuvār's viruttam performance further highlights and enhances such resonances of sound and meaning.

The refrain of the Tēvāram hymn links the hymns with the Tamil folk song and other musical genres. It may form part or all of the fourth line of the stanza. A comparison of the fourth line of verses 6, 7, and 8 of Campantar I.69 (Poem 80) gives an idea of the way in which the poets vary themes, words, and sounds in the refrain. Literal and free translations are given for each line.

- 4 aṇaittuñ ceṇru tiraļuñ cāral aṇṇā-malaiyārē [text] all going, gathering slope—Aṇṇā-malai-god (god of Aṇṇāmalai hill-shrine) [literal trans.]
 "The Lord of (the hill-shrine of) Aṇṇāmalai, on whose slopes the entire herd gathers" [free trans.]
- 4 antip piraivan taṇaiyuñ cāral aṇṇā-malaiyārē
 the evening crescent moon, coming, embraces slope-Aṇṇāmalaigod
 "The Lord of Aṇṇāmalai, whose slope is embraced by the evening moon"

²⁰ The matted hair of Siva actually suggests the wild aspects of this god who destroyed Dakşa's sacrifice. The paradox of the wild, ascetic god who is also related to the Veda and ritual purity is a standard ingredient in the mythology of Siva.

4 agantān kāṭṭiy aruļic ceytār annā-malaiyārē the sacred Law showing, grace granted, Annā-malai-god. "The Lord of Annāmalai, who granted grace (to the gods), revealing the sacred Law."

Campantar 1.69.6,7,8

While Appar specialized in the kuruntokai and tantakam meters—his skill in the latter earned him the name "tantakaventar" (King of the Tantakam form)—Campantar composed seventy-two hymns in a number of prosodic forms in which auditory and visual principles of patterning are blended in a complex manner to produce poems that are essentially audiovisual conundrums or puzzles.²¹ Campantar's hymns in such forms as Molimarru and Talaccati are based on the principles of play on sound or meaning, or on the arrangement of syllables and lines within the verse. These poetic forms show the influence of the Sanskrit kāvya poetic tradition, in which authors of court epics composed entire cantos in the citrakāvya ("decorative" or "pictorial" poetry) mode, consisting of verses based on alliteration, puns, and other types of wordplay.²² For instance. Campantar III.374 is in the Iyamakam form (Sanskrit yamaka), in which the same cluster of syllables is repeated in different senses in two halves of a line of verse; III.375 is a Mālaimārru couplet, in which the letters and syllables of the first line of the verse, when read backwards, are identical with those of the second line.²³ In the Cakkaramarru and Elukürrirukkai forms, the poem has a graphic design, creating pictures of a wheel and a chariot, respectively; the chariot form is achieved by splitting the lines into seven "decks" of three to thirteen segments in a regular pattern.24 For obvious reasons, I have omitted such poems from this anthology of translations from the Tēvāram. Nevertheless, it is important to be aware of them, since they reveal Campantar as a "literary" poet, a self-conscious craftsman displaying his skill in the sophisticated "Sanskritic" style of his day.

²¹ Appar's Kuruntokai poems are found in Book V, and his Tāṇṭakam poems are in Book VI of the Tevāram. Campantar's "pattern" poems are distributed in the three books of his hymns, and identified in editions of the poems.

²² On citrakāvya in Sanskrit poetry, see A. K. Warder, Indian Kāvya Literature, vol. 3 (Delhi: Motilal Banarsidass, 1977), pp. 223–28.

²¹ Campantar III.374, "tungu kongainañ cataiyatē tüyakantanañ cataiyatē"; III.375, "yāmāmā ni yāmāmā yālīkāmā kānākā / kānākāmā kālīyā māmāyānī māmāyā."

²⁴ In some of these unusual forms Campantar adopts shorter or longer stanzaic patterns, e.g., the Irukkukkural, a short couplet, as in hymns I.90–96. K. Vellaivāranan discusses compositional forms in Campantar's hymns in detail in Panniru tirumurai varalāru, pp. 428–52. See Somasundaram, Tirujāānasambandhar, pp. 198–202, for a clear and concise description of Campantar's "pattern" hymns; Somasundaram also provides a graphic representation of the Elukururukkai (Rathabandha, "Chariot") poem (Campantar I.128).

The Language of the Poems

The Tamils of today practice a form of diglossia in which a "pure" or "literary" language ("centamil") is used in formal and written contexts. while the spoken language consists of a wide variety of dialects that diverge in various ways from the literary form. Though modern literary Tamil is recognizably continuous with the Tamil of the Cankam anthologies, it also shows significant differences in vocabulary and grammatical forms. The rhetorical framework and patterns of the Cankam poems, many of which are dramatic monologues, may convey to us some idea of the spoken language of the classical age, but that language is far removed from modern spoken Tamil. In contemporary Tamilnadu, Cankam literature is the province of scholars and advanced students of Tamil. The situation is somewhat different with the Tevaram hymns. The language of these hymns stands somewhere between the literary language of the classical age and standard modern literary Tamil. It contains many archaic words, often makes use of the conventions, formulae, and vocabulary of Cankam literature, and has a recognizably "classical" tone. At the same time it is simpler in style and closer to modern literary usage, so that the general, overall sense of the hymns is directly accessible to the average Tamil reader or listener.

The diction of the poets, like their religion, is a blend of Sanskritic and Tamil elements. Words of Sanskrit origin, such as īcan (Sanskrit īśa, the Lord), mūrtti (mūrti, image, form), vētam (Veda), pātam (pāda, foot), and kītam, (gīta, song), occur side by side with Tamil words, some of them having the same meaning, such as iraivan (Lord, king), marai (Veda), ati (foot), and pattu, patal (song). In some cases, even where the context is primarily brahmanical, the poets prefer to use Tamil words with largely indigenous and local cultural associations: e.g., vinai for karma, māl for Visnu, vītu for moksa (liberation), vennīru for bhasma (ash). Words used to denote objects, experiences, and ideas deeply rooted in Tamil literature and culture tend to be decidedly Tamil in their linguistic orientation: anpu, kātal (love); virumpu-, mēvu- (to desire, to love); kunru, malai (hill); tolu- (to worship, serve); kõyil (palace, temple); kõ, komān (king, prince, lord); katal (sea); polil (grove). In several songs the poets use proverbs and vivid colloquial expressions that are familiar to the Tamil even today: "My heart is whirled about / like yoghurt in a churn" (Appar IV.97.3; Poem 188); "[I am] like one who puts aside the oil lamp / to warm himself with a firefly" (Appar IV.5.7; Poem 239). The saints' own coinages have become slogans, popular sayings and "proverbs" today, the most famous being Appar's "We are slaves to no man" ("nāmārkkun kuṭiy allōm," VI.312.1; Poem 240), and "My task is only to serve" ("en katan pani ceytu kitappatē," V.133.9; Poem 172), and Cuntarar's "Life is an illusion, / all things end in dust" ("vālvāvatu māyamm itu maṇṇāvatu tiṇṇam," VII.78.1; Poem 69).

Following the work of Parry and Lord, 25 scholars have applied the idea of the formula and formulaic composition to many folk and oral traditions in world literature. Kailasapathy's book on Cankam poetry is a study of "Tamil heroic poetry" from the point of view of oral poetics.²⁶ Hart has pointed out that formulae and conventions can be as much a part of the technique of the "literary" as the "oral" poet, and that the poems of the classical anthologies are probably a highly stylized "literary" form modeled on earlier poems composed by bards in the oral tradition and making self-conscious use of "oral" formulae.27 As successors of the Cankam poets, and as poets working with a form that is oral and musical, the Tevaram saints use a large number of formulaic phrases, constructions, and themes. These range from epithets such as piraicūti ("he who is crowned with the crescent moon") to combinations such as mālkatal ("the great sea") and vampulam polil ("fragrant grove"). As noted in the discussion of the refrains above, such formulaic phrases are really bases that are capable of being expanded or contracted according to the demands of meter and context. Thus "mankai pankan," "the lady's spouse" or "he who shares his body with his lady," can be expanded to "vārār mulai mankai pankan," "the spouse of the lady whose breasts are bound by the breastcloth," or "vāruru [or vārkol] vaņa mulai mankai pankan", "the spouse of the lady with the beautiful breasts bound by the breastcloth," and so on. Cataimuti, "crown of matted hair," can be prefixed by piraiyani ("adorned by the crescent moon"), or nīrulāvu ("where the river flows"), and so forth.

The poets are often motivated by considerations of musicality to create "easy" rhyming phrases, and to extend shorter patterns of etukai in their verses, by using words such as malinta/mali, ulām/ulāvu/ulavu, uṭai/uṭaiya, koļ/koṇṭa/koṇṭator, ār/ārnta, taru/tarum, vaļar, tikal, ilankal ilankum, and cēr, used in the sense of "endowed with" or "possessing." The effect can be one of circumlocution laced with wordplay, as in the four lines of Campantar I.65.1:

1 maicērkaņţar . . . "He whose throat is (cēr) dark"

2 meycēr poṭiyar . . . "He who smears (lit., 'has,' cēr) ashes on his body"

26 See esp. Kailasapathy, Tamil Heroic Poetry, ch. 4.

²⁵ Milman Parry, Les Formulas et la métrique d'Homère (Paris, 1928), and Albert B. Lord, The Singer of Tales (London, 1960), pioneer works advancing the theory of improvisation and formulaic composition in bardic and other oral traditions.

²⁷ Hart, Poems, pp. 152–58. Though the Tēvāram authors were "lettered" men, and the hymns themselves are sophisticated literary works, as musical compositions in the Indian context, the hymns are very much in the realm of oral composition and transmission.

- 3 kaicēr vaļaiyar . . . "(Women) who wear (cēr) bracelets on their wrists"
- 4 paicēr aravalkulār . . . "(Women who have mounds of Venus like the hood-ed (cēr) cobra"

Sentence and Line

In addition to being an independent formal unit, the Tevaram verse also tends to be grammatically independent, most often consisting of a single sentence that is completed within the boundaries of the stanza. The poets favor certain formulaic patterns in constructing these stanzaic sentences. A common pattern is the string of epithets and nouns culminating in a verb, in the stotra style, as in "maraiyāṇai mācilā ...," Campantar II.148.1 (Poem 15).²⁸ In another common motif the poets link an iconographic or mythological description of Siva in one half of the verse with the description of a shrine, landscape, or the activities of devotees in the other half. The formula might read like this: "The abode of the Lord who is x cdots. is y cdots where. . . ." In this latter type of verse, the descriptions, especially in the longer meters, can become very complex, a complexity facilitated and accentuated by features inherent in Tamil grammar and syntax, which will be discussed below.

Phrases, epithets, and clauses fit neatly into the "slot" created by the metrical line within the verse. However, there are also many poems where the Nāyaṇārs create a pattern of enjambment, in which a new idea, image, or formulaic unit begins within one line and is completed in the following line,²⁹ as in Campantar I.103.8 (where the beginning of a new formulaic unit is indicated by a solidus):

iṭantapemmā / nēṇamatāyu maṇamāyum toṭarntapemmāṇ / rūmaticūṭi varaiyārtam maṭantaipemmāṇ / vārkalalōccik kālaṇaik katantapemmān / kātalceykōyil kalukkunrē

1 (a) The Lord (pemmān) who gored (the elephant); / (b) (by the gods) who turned into the boar and the goose

2 the Lord who was pursued; / (c) crowned with the pure moon, the great mountain's daughter's Lord; / (d) raising his foot bound by the hero's anklet, the god of Death (kālaṇ)

28 See my discussion of the stotra form in Chapter 3 above.

²⁹ Kailasapathy suggests that this kind of syncopation of the grammatical and metrical lines is part of the Cankam technique of versification. Tamil Heroic Poetry, pp. 146, 177–78.

4 the Lord who conquered— / (e) The temple he loves is Kaluk-kunru.

In this verse, the description of Śiva's attributes and deeds precedes his name, and "pemmāṇ" (the Lord), the grammatical subject of each of the descriptive phrases (b), (c), and (d) is separated from the phrase and placed at the beginning of the following line. In recitation as well as in musical performance, this kind of overflowing pattern creates a sense of suspense and syncopated rhythms in the verse.

Patikam and Poem

In this study I have often treated Tēvāram verses as though they were independent poems. My justification for this, of course, has been the fact that they are treated as such within the Tamil Śaiva tradition. In modern usage the word patikam can denote either one stanza or an entire sequence of ten or eleven verses. In many Tēvāram hymns, in addition to the unity created by meter, an overall sense of unity may also be provided by the refrains, place names and other constants, and patterns of descriptive formulae. In other poems, each verse may stand out much more as a separate vignette, the ten verses drawing upon diverse aspects of the stock of Tamil Śaiva devotional themes. In either case, the result is a flexible structure that permits the reader and listener to treat and respond to one verse, several verses, or the entire poem, as meaningful wholes.

The Text and the Translation

In selecting hymns for translation, I had several models before me in the form of anthologies of selections compiled by scholars and teachers in the Tamil Śaiva tradition. The best-known anthologies of this type are the Umāpaticivam tēvāra aruļmurait tiraṭṭu and the Akattiyar tēvārat tiraṭṭu.³0 The former was compiled by the fourteenth-century Śaiva guru Umāpati Civācāriyār; it consists of ninety-nine stanzas from the hymns of the three Tēvāram poets, organized under ten categories corresponding to the states and stages of the soul in its relationship with the Lord (pati) according to the Śaiva Siddhānta philosophy. The latter is a popular "digest" consisting of twenty-five hymns, whose compilation is attributed to Akattiyar, the legendary sage and culture-hero of the Tamils.³¹ Tradition has it that by reading these twenty-five songs in order, a devotee may get the benefit of reading all seven books of the Tēvāram. 32 Yet other collections exist, designed to serve as guides for pilgrimage or remembrance of sacred places, and provide a selection of verses addressed to Siva at each of the sacred places (pati) at which the Nāyanārs sang.33 My own aim in putting together an anthology of selections from the Tēvāram hymns has been to provide those interested in Indian religion and civilization with a sourcebook of accurate, representative translations from an important text in Tamil religious history. In selecting the hymns, I have tried to represent the full range of content and style in the Tēvāram. I have also been guided by Tamil Saiva taste and practice in the choice of poems: many of the best-known and most beloved verses of the saints can be found here. and the selections range from single stanzas to entire hymns. I have divided the translations into four sections that are designed to cover the major themes of the religion of the Nayanars. I have given English headings of my own for individual verses, hymns, or groups of hymns in which I see a particularly coherent or striking presentation of a theme. In the case of the few hymns that have traditional Tamil titles, I have given the Tamil title along with my English translation of the title.

³⁰ Umāpaticivam tēvāra aruļmurait tiraṭṭu, with the commentary of Pa. Irāmanāta Piḷļai (Madras: SISSW Publishing Society, 1961); and Akattiyar tēvārat tiraṭṭu: Mūlamum uraiyum, with Glossary and Commentary by Kayappākkam Catāciva Ceṭṭiyār (Madras: SISSW Publishing Society, 1976).
³¹ On the Akattivar legend, see Nilakanta Sastri, Development of Religion.

In the absence to date of a complete critical edition of the Tēvāram, I have based my translations on the standard popular edition, the "Kalakam" edition, published by the South India Śaiva Siddhānta Works Publishing Society.³⁴ In numbering the hymns I have followed the Kalakam edition, which provides a continuous numbering for the corpus of each poet (e.g., Campantar 1–383), at the same time indicating the number of the Tirumurai book in which a particular hymn appears. Where the Kalakam edition provides information regarding both the pan designated for the hymn and the sacred place to which it is dedicated, I give only the latter information. Alternative names of shrines have been given

³² Almost every important sacred text in Hinduism has been excerpted and summarized in this way. There are "Rāmāyaṇas" and "Bhāgavatas" of varying lengths, ranging from two to two hundred verses. The ultimate purpose of all such capsule versions is the same: to enable the reader to cover the entire text effectively in a short time, thus earning the merit that, as the phalasruti verses specify accrues to devotees who have read the entire work.

³³ E.g., Panniru tirumuraip peruntirattu, ed. Pa. Irāmanāta Piļļai (Madras: SISSW Publishing Society, 1961, 1980); the series of publications on regional sites related to the Tevaram (e.g., Kāvirit tenkarait talankaļ ["Sites on the southern bank of the Kaveri"], 1965), published by the Madras Center of the Tarumapuram Atinam; and occasional publications by such organizations as the Puracait Tirunerik Kaļakam (Puracaivākkam Religion Society).

³⁴ Tēvāram, vol. one, Tirumurai I-III, Tiruñāṇacampantar tēvārap patikaṅkal, ed. Kayappākkam Catāciva Ceṭṭiyār (Madras: SISSW Publishing Society [Kalakam], 1973; originally published in 1927); and Tēvāram, vol. two, Tirumurai IV-VII, Tirunāvukkaracar, Cuntaramūrtti tēvārap patikaṅkal, ed. Kayappākkam C. Ceṭṭiyār (Madras: SISSW Publishing Society [Kalakam], 1973; originally published in 1928–1929). Hereafter: Tēvāram Kalakam edition.

in parentheses. Thus, in the anthology that follows in Part Two, Campantar's verse "antamum ātiyum" (Poem 30) is indicated as:

30. Campantar I.39.1 Vēţkaļam (Tiruvēţkaļam)

Of the other editions of the Tēvāram available to me, I have regularly consulted the Tarumapuram Ātīṇam's edition, published in seven volumes with commentary and notes.³⁵ The Ātīṇam edition is not a critical edition, and the commentaries represent the views of individual contemporary commentators. Since there is no real tradition of earlier commentaries available to us, I have benefited greatly from the commentaries in this edition; however, I have not treated them as absolute authorities in the matter of interpretation, nor have I found the readings in this edition superior to those in the Kalakam edition. It is only after completing the present volume that I was able to consult the new edition of the Tēvāram undertaken by T. V. Gopal Iyer, directed by François Gros, under the auspices of the Institut français d'indologie in Pondicherry.³⁶ In general, my own evaluation of variant readings and difficult passages is in agreement with Gopal Iyer's.

In translating the hymns I have tried to stay as close to the original as possible. What this means in practical terms can be seen by comparing my translation of a Tēvāram stanza with the Tamil original. In the Tamil below, the square brackets indicate the limits of the clauses, which are marked by Roman numerals. Parentheses in the literal translation indicate implications or possible meanings.

eṇaittō rūḷiy [In every cosmic	ațiyã : age devotee	rēttav s praisin	imaiyõr 1g Himala		perumāṇār king/lord]
11 ninaittut [thinking (in the heart)	toluvār who worship	pāvan sin	tīrkkum ending	nimalar pure one]	III uraikõyil [dwelling temple]
IV kaṇaitta mēti {bellowed buffa	kāņā ilo not seeir		yan erdsman]		r kulalūta l flute-playing]

³⁵ Tēvāram (Paņmuzai). Tirumuṭai I-VII. Tiruñāṇacampantar, Tirunāvukkaracar, Cuntaramūrtti Tēvāram, published in seven volumes with commentary by various scholars. Tarumapuram: Tarumapuram Ātīṇam, 1953–1964. Hereafter: Tēvāram Ātīṇam edition.

³⁶ The hymns of Nanacampantar have been published in Tēvāram: Hymnes Šivaïtes du pays tamoul, vol. I, ed. Gopal lyer, and the hymns of Appar and Cuntarar in vol. II (1985) in the same series thereafter: Tēvāram Pondicherry edition). This edition, pp. lx–lxxii (in the introduction, "Towards Reading the Tēvāram," by F. Gros), and pp. lxxiii–xc (lyer,

	VI anaittuñ	cenru	tiraļuñ	VII cāral	viii annā malaiyārē
	[all together	going/ coming			[Aṇṇāmalai (hill shrine.])
	The king o	of the Hima		I the Lord w	vhom devo		I
	in every ag	ge of the un		I ne who des		H
		vho worshi		II
		he shrine o		HII / VIII
on whose slopes						VII
		nan looks f		IV
		low he hear		IV
and when he plays his flute						V
the whole herd gathers around.						VI tar I.69.6 (Po

The interlinear translation shows that the word order of the English translation is different from that of the original. Since Tamil has what A. K. Ramanujan aptly calls a "left-branching syntax", 37 phrases such as "in-the-universe's-every-age-devotees-praising-Himalayan-gods-king" read in reverse order in English: "The king of the Himalayan gods, the Lord whom devotees praise in every age of the universe." I have had to supply the prepositions "of" and "in," which make clear in English the relationships between "king" and "Himalayan gods," and "praise" and "age." In the Tamil, it is only from the position of "imaiyōr" directly before "perumāṇār," and from the general context of the phrase, that we may infer that the two words are connected by a (possessive) case relationship. The same is true of "ūli" and "ētta." All the nouns are in the base or nominative form, and "ētta" (praise) is neutral in regard to the gender, number, and other particulars of the noun that is the subject of the act of praising.

In the interlinear translation I have numbered from I to VIII the phrases and clauses that make up the sentence which is the verse in the order in which they appear in the Tamil. The reordering of these units in the English version reflects the difference between Tamil and English syntax and word order. The Tamil verse is thematically and structurally divided into two halves, the first half (the first two lines) devoted to the description of Siva and the second to a description of the environs of the hill-shrine of [&]quot;Tamil Introduction"), provides a detailed discussion of the manuscript tradition of the Tēvāram.

³⁷ Ramanujan, Hymns, p. xvii.

Annāmalai. In my translation I have tried to keep this thematic division intact. In the Tamil, "anṇāmalaiyārē is not only the predicate of the sentence but also the constant element of the refrain in the hymn and the last word in the verse.³⁸ The dramatic effect of the placement of "aṇṇāmalai-yārē" at the end of the verse is lost in the English, but the overall structural relationship between the image of Śiva and the image of Aṇṇāmalai in the original is retained.

In poems where keeping the continuous sentence structure of the Tamil would have resulted in awkward English, I have translated the verse in several sentences. There are also many verses composed of short sentences in the Tamil that lend themselves well to being rendered into brief English sentences. The reader should keep in mind that even in translations where I have kept the single-sentence structure of the original, the effect of my English sentence, where the relationships between words and clauses are clearly defined by means of relative pronouns and prepositions, is bound to differ from the complex coherence of the original, which stems from the "ease with which many vaguely related things can be included in the same sentence" in Tamil.39 Neither the linear structure nor the sound and rhythmic effects of Tamil verse can be imitated in English; I have not tried to re-create these features in English, except to retain the formal device of the refrain in the translation of entire hymns. I have tried to capture in the tone of my translations the unique mix of "classical" elegance and grandeur and colloquial textures that characterizes the Tamil originals. I hope that the strategies outlined above have resulted in translations that are faithful both to the words and design of the Tēvāram verses and to the idiom and rhythms of modern English speech.

Even if one were to ignore the problem of the lack of a critical edition of the $T\bar{e}v\bar{a}ram$ —and this is a continuing problem, given the situation of the text in a semi-oral and musical tradition—the lack of a classical tradition of $T\bar{e}v\bar{a}ram$ commentary analogous to that which is available for the hymns of the \bar{A} lvārs is a serious obstacle to any attempt at a "definitive" translation. As I have noted earlier, the language of the $T\bar{e}v\bar{a}ram$ is midway between the language of the Cankam poems and "later" Tamil, and the hymns contain a large number of words of which the only attested occurrence is in a particular verse in the $T\bar{e}v\bar{a}ram$. The ambiguity of poetic syntax in Tamil gives rise to several possible interpretations for the same phrases. The hymns of Cuntarar are notorious for their obscurity, as will become apparent in my discussion of particular problems in my notes to his hymns.⁴⁰ Thus it is that, although the formulaic content and affective qualities of a Tēvāram verse make its general meaning easily accessible to its popular audience, the precise details of a large number of verses remain a problem for the scholar. In some ways, then, the translations I offer here form part of the ongoing scholarly exegesis of the Tēvāram hymns.

³⁸ According to Hart, the descriptions in many classical poems look forward to a word or phrase at the end of the poem, without which the description is incomplete. This results in a particular sort of coherence in form and meaning. Hart, Poems, p. 186.

³⁹ Ibid.

Conclusion

The power and beauty of the Tēvāram hymns lie not as much in their formal and musical aspects as in the passionate devotional spirit that informs them. It is as great religious poetry that the Tamils have always valued, and always will look upon, the Tēvāram. Speaking of the hymns of the saints in an endowed lecture on the Śaiva Siddhānta at Benares Hindu University in 1947, Professor G. Subramania Pillai, an eminent Tamil Śaiva scholar and devotee, said:

Those who have attained Śivajñānam [Enlightenment through Śiva] have had the entrancing experience of celestial visions of the Refulgent Light. These glimpses of entrancing experience have evoked ejaculations of ineffable joy which have melted into hymnal and honeyed Tamil verses. These Tamil verses we cherish as the Tamil Veda, the Sacred Scriptures of saintly revelations. We chant, sing and meditate upon them. They are Tevaram and Tiruvacakam. To the unfaithful they are mere words.⁴¹

Yet words are the very stuff out of which poets make their magic. And words, especially when they are born of the fundamental and significant experiences of individuals and communities, have a power that often, and paradoxically, transcends language. I am convinced that the spirit of the Tēvāram will shine through any translation that aims at being faithful to the original, and that even outsiders to the Tamil Śaiva tradition will respond to the poetry and vitality of the religious and cultural experience embodied in the words of the Tamil saints.

Twentieth-century commentators and interpreters have given much attention to the Tēvāram hymns of Cuntarar. Cuntaramūrtti cuvāmikaļ aruļicceyta tēvārap patikankaļ (Periyapurāṇa murai) (hereafter: Cuntaramūrtti Tēvāram) (Madras: Śaiva Siddhānta Mahā Samājam, 1935), has good notes by A. Cōmacuntaram Ceṭṭiyār; and Dorai Rangaswamy, Religion and Philosophy of Tēvāram, Bk. 2, provides a detailed exegesis of Cuntarar's work.

⁴¹ G. Subrahmaniya Pillai, "Introduction and History," p. 46.

PART TWO

An Anthology of Hymns from the Tēvāram

Mūrtti: Images of the Lord

A thousand scriptures speak of his attributes and signs, his shrines, his paths, his greatness-O witless people, that your hearts have not been won! Appar V.204.6

The poems in this section focus on the person and nature of Siva as the poets of the Tēvāram visualize them. Śiva Mahādeva, the great god of the pan-Hindu tradition, is the "Lord" of these poems, and many verses celebrate him in his cosmic dimensions. He is identified as Îsa, the "Lord" of the theistic Upanisads,1 the Supreme Deity who manifests himself in and as all things in the universe. Like the awesome and life-giving Rudra-Śiva of the Vedic Śatarudrīya litany, Śiva of the Tēvāram is manifest in the wild aspects of nature, in forests and bodies of water, in healing plants, and in all forms of life. As Astamūrti (Tamil attamūrtti), Śiva is the five elements, the sun, the moon, and the sacrificer. He who is the energizing force in all life is also Hara, the destroyer, associated with death and the symbols of death. Above all, he is "siva," "the auspicious Lord," he who can transform even the terrifying and gruesome aspects of existence into a blessing. This cosmic vision of God is tempered by the intimacy of the bhakti perspective of the saints, in which Siva is portrayed as the "beloved Lord" of his devotees.

The Agamic heritage of the religion of the Tamil poets is most clearly expressed in the iconographic descriptions of Siva that are the hallmark of the Tēvāram. The Agamas give the specifications for up to twenty-five mūrtis (iconographic forms) in which Siva may be represented.2 For each mūrti the manuals describe in detail the attire, posture, weapons, ornaments, and accessories of Siva as well as the representation of other figures and objects involved in the conception of the mūrti. For instance, Kälasamhäramurti ("the Lord who destroys Käla [Death]") is described3 as standing with his right foot on a lotus seat, with the left raised up to kick Käla on the chest; he displays three eyes, tusks, matted hair, four or eight arms, "the right hands in the former case carrying the trident lifted up to the ear and the hatchet or varada pose, the left hands being in sūcī pose near the navel and vismaya pose near the crown." Kala (Yama, Death) and the boy Markandeya, the two other characters involved in this myth, are also described. The textual prescriptions are followed, with minor variations, in Pallava and Cola temple sculpture and bronzes. (See illus. 12.) In the Tēvāram descriptions, however, we encounter a poetic iconography in which selection of detail is governed not by the canons of temple sculpture but by the aesthetic of devotion. In the typical stanza the poet presents only a few details of a particular murti, a vignette rather than a full-fledged portrait.

¹ E.g., The Isa and Śvetāsvatara Upanisads.

² See Dorai Rangaswamy, Religion and Philosophy, 1: 194-95, for a list of these forms.

As with most Hindu deities, the iconography of Siva reflects the accretion and synthesis, over centuries, of multiple mythological and artistic traditions, further varied by regional differences. In the introductions to the sections on poems relating to Siva in his volume of translation from classical Sanskrit poetry, D.H.H. Ingalls provides an excellent account of the iconography of Siva in the Hindu tradition.⁵ In a detailed study of the saint Cuntaramurtti's visualization of Siva, Dorai Rangaswamy compares the description of the mūrtis in the Āgamas and Purāṇas with Pallava temple sculpture and the descriptions in the hymns of Cuntarar.⁶ My own general account here is offered with the aim of helping readers make their way through what may appear to be a bewildering array of attributes. It is also my intention, in the process, to point out details that are typical of the Tamil or South Indian traditions.

As with the Sanskrit poets, Śiva's head and hair are favorite subjects with the Tēvāram saints. The god's crown of flame-colored matted hair (caṭai, caṭaimuṭi), which indicates his persona as the great yogi (ascetic), is often described in minute detail.⁷ In the Tamil hymns, Śiva's hair is 4 Ibid., p. 360.

⁵ Ingalls, Anthology, sections 4, 5.

6 Dorai Rangaswamy, Religion and Philosophy, 1: 179-499.

³ Ibid., pp. 359–60, contains a complete description of the Kâlasaṃhāramūrti.

^{&#}x27;It is interesting to note that, in contrast to the Sanskrit kāvya poets, the Tēvāram poets rarely describe Siva as the meditating yogi, although Siva's yogic persona is the basis of his form as Dakṣiṇāmūrti, the Teacher, a popular form in Tamil poetry and sculpture. For classic descriptions of Siva as the yogi in Sanskrit poetry, see Kālidāsa, Kumārasambhava III.44-51, and Sūdraka's benedictory stanza in the play Mrechakatikā.

INTRODUCTION 97

always portrayed in motion, swaying as he dances, rides his bull, or wanders as a homeless beggar. The matted locks or braids are adorned by the crescent moon (mati, piraimati), the river Ganges (Gangã), one or more skulls (talai, venṭalai), snakes (aravu), and flowers. Most important among the flowers and leaves that Śiva wears in his hair are the golden konṛai, the vaṇṇi, and the mattam (datura). Representing Śiva's fiery anger and destructive power is the third, vertical eye in his forehead. The god's earrings are often described, especially in order to suggest his androgynous form as Ardhanārīśvara, in which he shares his body with his spouse Umā (Umai) or Pārvatī, the daughter of the Himalaya mountain (malaimakai, malaiyān makai). Thus in many Tēvāram hymns Śiva is pictured as wearing a man's earring, the dangling kuļai or kuṇṭalam, on one ear, and the woman's scroll or stud (curui, tōṭu) on the other.

Śiva is "the Lord with the stained throat" (karaikkantan), his throat having turned blue (nīla-) or black (karu-) upon his swallowing the poison emitted by the snake Vāsuki when the gods and demons, using the snake as their churning rope, together churned the milk ocean in search of ambrosia. Like his devotees, the Lord wears a string of akku (akṣa, rudrākṣa, "Śiva's eye") seeds around his neck, often entwined with a snake.

Śiva's "coral-red" (pavaļavaṇṇam) or fire-hued body is covered with white ash (nīṛu, pūti, vīpūti) from the burning-ground (kāṭu, iṭukāṭu), where he loves to dance his midnight dance. His lower garment is a loin-cloth with a waistband (kīļuṭai, kīļār kōvaṇam), flayed elephant hide (ka-riy urī), 10 tigerskin (pulittōl), or a combination of these. Skulls and snakes adorn his chest, as does the sacred thread, symbol of brahminhood. In his several arms—these range from four to eight—the god holds various things: fire (tī, aṇal), a small drum (uṭukkai, takkai), a young deer or fawn (māṇ, māṇmaṛi), a battle-axe (malu), or a trident (cūlam, cūlappaṭai, mū-vilaivēl). Certain weapons or attributes are specific to particular mūrtis. In their stanzaic vignettes the poets freely draw upon this repertoire in various combinations. According to the mythological tradition, Śiva acquired many of his accoutrements and attributes in the course of his conflict with the sages of Tārakavaṇam (dārukavana, the Pine Forest), who were angered when, as punishment for their arrogance, the god appeared ping with blood, draped around him.

[&]quot;Other flowers and leaves of the Tamil country mentioned in connection with Śiva in the Tēvāram are kūviļam and erukku. The poets also mention the tradition of offering a collection of "eight fresh flowers" (eṭṭunāṇmalar) sacred to Śiva. See V. S. Agrawala, Śiva-Mahādeva (Varanasi, 1966), p. 27, for a discussion of the ritual of the "eight flowers" (Sanskrit aṣṭapuṣpikā) in connection with the Pāśupata cult.

⁹ Siva destroyed Kāma, the god of Love, with fire emitted from this forehead eye.
¹⁰ Siva flayed the hide of the elephant-demon Gajāsura, and danced with the hide, dripbefore their wives as a naked beggar and seduced them.¹¹ The Pine Forest sages tried to use black magic against Siva; they dispatched various hostile creatures armed with magic spells to destroy the god. But Siva simply flayed the tiger and put its skin on as a garment; picked up the drum, fire, deer, snakes, and severed heads that were thrown at him and made them into his weapons; turned the horrible goblins and spirits that attacked him into his retinue; and began dancing on the dwarf Apasmāra (muyalakan), demon of ignorance.

Siva's close association with animals is reflected in his persona as Pasupati (pacupati), "Lord of the Beasts," a name that the Tamil Śaivas interpret as meaning "Lord of Souls" (pacu). Like most Hindu gods, Śiva has a vāhana (vehicle or mount), the white bull (viṭai) Nandi. Identified as Nandin or Nandikeśvara, one of the gaṇas ("multitudes," spirit attendants) of Śiva in Kailāsa, this bull can be found seated facing the sanctum in all temples of Śiva. The gaṇa host is made up of different sorts of beings: grotesque, dwarflike goblins or spirits (pūtam), the emaciated ghosts (pēy) that dance with Śiva in the burning-ground (iṭukāṭu) where corpses are cremated. Some of the gaṇas are human devotees turned into spirits. The band of spirits accompanies Śiva when he rides on his bull and becomes a band of musicians when he performs his dance.

Siva's feet are a standard item in the descriptive repertoire. Invoking them as symbols and embodiments of the Lord's grace, the poets call them "beautiful [lit., rosy] feet" (cēvați), "golden feet" (ponnați), "holy feet" (tiruvați), flower-feet (pūnkalal), feet that offer refuge, and feet that kicked at Death (in the myth of Mārkaṇḍeya). The feet are also described in iconographic terms as "adorned by ringing anklets" and "wearing the hero's or warrior's band (kalal)," suggesting Śiva's personae as dancer and Tamil hero.¹³ The importance given to the Lord's feet must be understood in the context of the pan-Indian conception of venerating the feet of a person of higher rank as an act of deference and love. In India, one shows respect for one's superiors, elders, parents, teacher, and masters by placing one's head upon the feet of the honored one and by symbolically accepting the dust from those feet as a sign of favor or blessing. "Atiyār," the Tamil Śaiva term for "devotee," literally means "one who is at the feet (ați) [of the Lord]."

¹¹ Kanta purānam, Dakṣa Kāṇṭam, chs. 13, 14. See Dorai Rangaswamy's discussion, Religion and Philosophy, 1: 527–30.

¹² The Nayanar Karaikkal Ammaiyar became one of Siva's ghosts or demonic spirits (pêy). The ganas are also called pantam, "attendants."

¹³ In the classical civilization of the Tamils, heros and great warriors received the kalal, an ornamental band or ring worn midway between ankle and knee, as a prize for victory and valor. The kalal can be seen on Siva's leg in many Cola bronzes of Siva as the Lord of the Dance.

Among the particular mūrtis of Śiva, Appar, Cuntarar, and Campantar favor Națarāja, the dancing Lord (see illus. 8), and Bhikṣāṭana, Śiva the Beggar Lord (see illus. 9), the two forms that developed in South Indian iconography and mythology in rich and unique ways. The Bhiksatana form of the Lord figures in the myths of Siva's conflict with the sages of the Pine Forest. Unlike the Națarāja form, the Bhiksātana mūrti is not associated with specific shrines but forms part of the mythological and festival-related traditions of all the major Tamil shrines. The character of Siva is perhaps best revealed in his celebrated form as Lord of the Dance. According to the pan-Hindu tradition, Siva has many dances, most of which are vigorous and violent (tāndava), in keeping with his function as Destroyer.14 The Lord dances at twilight and in the night; his favorite arena is the burning-ground for the dead, but he also dances in various other places in celebration of his victory over demons, 15 Drawing from Tamil Saiva lore, the Tēvāram saints add local varieties of dance (Tamil kūttu) to Śiva's repertoire; among these are the patutam, pāni, kotukotti, and pantarankam, some of which are described in the Cilappatikaram epic.16 The poets seem to be aware of the local myths regarding Siva's dance at Tiruvālankātu and Tillai (Chidambaram) shrines, although they do not mention these myths in their fully developed form, in which Siva defeats the Goddess in a dance contest. 17 Along with Kāraikkāl Ammajyar, the Tēvāram poets provide us with the earliest descriptions of the celebrated dance of Siva in the "Little Ampalam hall in Tillai (Chidambaram)" (tillaic cirrampalam), a dance that lies at the core of Tamil Śaiva mysticism as elaborated in the Siddhanta philosophy and is represented in the Cola bronzes of the Dancing Lord. 18 According to Tirumular's Tirumantiram and later texts, in this dance Siva performs his fivefold

¹⁴ See Ingalls, Anthology, section 4, and Dorai Rangaswamy, Religion and Philosophy, 1: 441-67.

¹⁵ Śiva's dance as Gajāsura-saṃhāra-mūrti, cloaked in the elephant hide, is a popular theme in Pallava and Cōla sculpture.

¹⁶ On the kotukotti and pāṇṭarankam dances, see Dorai Rangaswamy, Religion and Philosophy, 1: 394–96. The author (p. 394) suggests that pāṇṭarankam probably means "the white dance hall, . . . the place of ashes." In association with the myth of the burning of the three cities, it may mean the place where the cities were burned to ashes. It may also simply suggest the dance in the burning-ground. Siva, and perhaps Durgā, are described as dancing these two dances in Cilappatikāram VI.40–45.

¹⁷ For a discussion of the myths of the dance contests with the Goddess, see Shulman, Tamil Temple Myths, pp. 211–23.

¹⁶ Over time, an elaborate local mythology has grown around the arenas (Sanskrit sabhā, Tamil capai) of Śiva's dances in the Tamil country. The dance in Tillai is known as the anandatāṇḍava; as Lord of the Golden Hall (kaṇakacapai, poṇṇampalam) in Tillai, Śiva performs it in the Citsabhā ("Hall of the Supreme Consciousness"). Five other dances are performed in halls at Maturai, Puttūr, Kuṛrālam, Tiruvālaṅkāṭu, and Tirunelvēli. The seventh dance, the Dance of Destruction, is all-pervasive.

cosmic activity (pañcakṛtya) of creation, preservation, destruction, "veiling," and grace, each symbolized by a particular aspect of the icon. ¹⁹ The complex symbolism of the Tamil Naṭarāja is best summarized in the conclusion of Ananda Coomaraswamy's famous essay on the dance of Śiva; "The Essential Significance of Shiva's Dance is threefold: first, it is the image of his Rhythmic Play as the Source of all Movement within the Cosmos, which is represented by the Arch: Secondly, the Purpose of his Dance is to Release the Countless souls of men from the Snare of Illusion: Thirdly the Place of the Dance, Chidambaram, the Centre of the Universe, is within the Heart."²⁰

Like the sculptors of reliefs and icons in Tamil shrines, the Tēvāram poets portray Siva's myths in two modes: the iconic and the dynamic. In the former, the myth functions as a part of Siva's persona, the focus being on creating an iconic image of the god; in the latter, the myth or narrative comes to the fore, and the Lord is portrayed as principal actor in a dramatic event. The myths of the eight Vīrattānam shrines often receive such dynamic treatment, as do the legends of famous devotees such as Arjuna, Canticar, and Kannappar. Four myths, used repeatedly in both iconic and narrative modes, stand out in the Tevaram corpus: the burning of the three cities of the demons, the revelation of Siva in the cosmic pillar or flame-linga to the arrogant Brahma and Visnu, Siva's devouring of the poison emitted at the churning of the cosmic ocean, and his subjugation of the demon Ravana when the latter tried to uproot Kailasa hill (see illus. 11),21 Appar, Campantar, and Cuntarar impart a suggestive, poetic dimension to the understanding of these seminal myths in the Tamil Śaiva tradition, which play an important role in Tirumular's exposition of Tamil Saiva mystical doctrine in his Tirumantiram.²² We have already noted the distinctive manner in which Appar and Campantar use two of these myths: the former ends all his hymns with a description of the legend of Ravana, and the latter devotes the eighth and ninth verses of his hymns to the Ravana myth and the myth of the cosmic linga (illus. 10).

Two details of the Tevāram image of Śiva remain to be discussed: the presence of Śiva as the linga, and his relationship with the Goddess. Since ritual worship forms such an important part of the religion of the Tē-

¹⁹ See Ananda Coomaraswamy, "The Dance of Shiva," in The Dance of Shiva: Fourteen Indian Essays, revised edition (New York: Noonday Press, 1977), pp. 66–78, at 70–71. In this classic essay, Coomaraswamy discusses the meaning of the dance of Siva in the Tamil context. For a more wide-ranging study of Naṭarāja, consult C. Sivaramamurti's monumental Naṭarāja in Art, Thought and Literature (Delhi: National Museum, 1974).

²⁰ Coomaraswamy, "Dance," p. 77.

²¹ The murts of Siva associated with these myths are, respectively: Tripurāri or Tripurāntaka-mūrti, Lingodbhava-mūrti, Viṣāpaharaṇa-mūrti and Rāvaṇānugraha-mūrti. For brief summaries of the major myths of Siva in the Tēvūram, see Appendix D below.

²² Tirumülar, Tirumantiram, Tantiram 2 (Kalakam edition).

vāram.23 for all their celebration of the many mūrtis (lit., "embodiment," "embodied form") of the Lord, the poet-saints are also profoundly aware of the Lord as, and in, the linga (lit., "sign"), which is an aniconic image. It is to the linga that ritual worship is offered, be it in the shrine or at the home; and it is in the linga that the Lord is established (sthavara, Tamil taparam) and "dwells" in the garbhagrha (inner sanctum) at the heart of the Siva temple. While at one level the linga represents the phallus, the male "sign," this is not the primary significance of this image for the Tamil Saiva community. The consciousness of the linga as the primal image of Siva, as the image that represents the power and infinite potentiality of the divine and that is Siva as simultaneously manifest and unmanifest (sakala-niskala) informs the Tēvāram hymns on a metaphysical plane as well as in concrete descriptions of ritual worship (cf. illus, 5 and 10),24 As for the Goddess, we see that compared to her prominence in the later literary sources of Tamil Saivism and later versions of Tamil temple myths (talapurānam), her role in the Tēvāram is a relatively subdued one. 25 Here she is most often invoked as the inseparable "consort" and companion of the Lord, the lovely and gentle feminine figure who tempers the harshness of his personality, the sensitive witness of his heroic deeds (see illus. 6).26 At the same time, Appar, Cuntarar, and Campantar affirm the importance of the Goddess in their vision of Siva: to them, she is none other than the gentle, feminine side of the Lord, which they invoke in nearly every hymn, calling Siva "the Lord who shares his body with the Goddess" as Ardhanārīśvara, the symbol of perfect love, unity, equality, completeness (see illus, 7). Siva in the Tēvāram is rarely portrayed as the playful householder of the Sanskrit stanzaic tradition or the later Puranas: the god's wife and his two children (Skanda/Murukan and Ganesa) are no more than shadowy figures in his personal history; nor is Siva's band of spirits described with attention to individuality; these ganas remain "ganas," undifferentiated "crowds, multitudes."27

Whatever the particular focus of their description of Siva in different verses and poems, the Tēvāram saints emphasize lordship, divine grace, auspiciousness, and beauty as the chief attributes of their God. The lewd

²³ See Part One, Chapter 3 above.

²⁴ On the symbolism of the linga, see Stella Kramrisch, Presence of Šiva, ch. 7; and J.W.V. Curtis, "Space Concepts" in Experiencing Siva, ed. Clothey and Long, pp. 87–101.

²⁵ For the prominent role of the Goddess in the later talapuranam literature, consult Shulman, Tam 'Temple Myths.

²⁶ The dess has a central role in the theology of Māṇikkavācakar. See Yocum, Hymns to the Dancus Śiva, ch. 5.

²⁷ Consult Ingalls, Anthology, section 5. Among the three Têvāram saints, Cuntarar occasionally uses the ironic mode, making teasing remarks about Śiva's two wives (Pārvatī and the Ganges) and his comical family.

beggar, the dancer in the burning-ground, is at the same time the brahmin scholar who chants the Veda, the charismatic local hero of the Cankam tradition, skilled artist, and patron of the arts. As for the poets, like all of Siva's devotees, they are, above all, connoisseurs and lovers of the supramundane beauty of the Lord.

1 The Beautiful Lord

(POEMS 1-19)

The Red One

1. Appar IV.114.1

On strong shoulders like coral hills lie coils of matted hair like branching sea-coral.

Around the hair a hooded snake winds like a streak of coral.

With the snake my Father bears the coral red eye, and the young moon is a white flower on his crest.

Portrait in Silver

2. Appar IV.113.1

He bears a skull like a silver conch shell.
His twisted white sacred thread shines like a strand of silver rope.
Matted hair crowned with the white moon bright as beaten silver leaf, wearing white bones, the brahmin has smeared silver ash on his coral skin.

The Golden Lord

3. Cuntarar VII.24.1 Malapāți

O god with the golden form, you bind the tigerskin around your waist, and wear the golden konrai blossom on gleaming red hair! O King, great jewel, ruby in Malapāṭi, O Mother, whom can I think of but you?

Bull Rider

4. Campantar 1.71.7 Naraiyūre Citticearam

A heron feather and the bright datura adorn his matted hair. His flame-red body is covered with white ash. Over his girdle and loincloth he has bound a tigerskin encircled by lovely snakes. Thus, with anklets ringing, the Lord of Cittīccaram shrine comes riding on his bull.

5. Appar VI.307.7

If you would quickly get rid of your evil karma, say, "Kaṇṭiyūr, Kaṇṭiyūr!," home of the Lord who rides on his red-eyed bull, as Daṇḍin, Guṇḍodara, and Bhṛṅgiṛṭi, illustrious Nandin, Śaṅkukarṇa, he who created the world in ancient time, and he who measured the universe, all sing his praise in the Pallāṇṭu hymn, to the chorus of potbellied goblins with narrow eyes.

The Lute Player

6. Campantar 1.73.8 Kāṇūr

The coral-red Lord who loves to dwell in Kāṇūr of fragrant groves

4. Siva wears the flower of the datura (mattam) in his hair.

6. "Lute": vinai (Sanskrit vina), a stringed instrument similar to the yal. The vina has came to me chanting sweet Tamil poems. He stayed, playing the lute, singing songs to the beat of the mulavam and montai drums. Now he is gone, taking my beauty with him, leaving me pale as the kumil flower.

^{5.} The poet names several of Siva's gamas (attendant spirits) in this hymn, including the bull Nandin. Among those who sing the "pallantu" ("long live...") hymn that is traditionally addressed to kings and gods are Brahma the creator god and Viṣṇu the Strider.

The Lord Who Is Half Woman

7. Campantar I.77.1 Accirupākkam

My master who rules over Accirupākkam, displays two forms, having taken as half of himself the soft girl with waist small as gathered lightning. He has flowing matted hair like a mass of gold, in his body the color of sea-coral mingles with the hue of fire, and on the expanse framed by twin shoulder-hills he wears the white sacred thread and the rich ash.

8. Appar IV.8.10

An earring of bright new gold glows on one ear; a coiled conch shell sways on the other.

On one side he chants the melodies of the ritual Veda, on the other, he gently smiles.

Matted hair adorned with sweet konrai blossoms on one half of his head, and a woman's curls on the other, he comes.

The one is the nature of his form, the other, of hers;

And both are the very essence of his beauty.

survived as an important instrument in the tradition of South Indian classical (Carnatic) music. In some of his iconographic forms Siva is portrayed as playing the vīṇā (vīṇādhara). "Tāļam vīṇai paṇṇī": literally, "strumming the vīṇā to keep time [to his song]." The speaker in this poem is a lovelorn woman in the akam tradition. "Kōlanīrmai": excellent beauty, the quality of beauty. The kumiļ is a white flower.

^{8. &}quot;A woman's curls": kulal, a way of dressing the hair in tubular coils.

9. Cuntarar VII.84 Kanapper

1

When shall I see, to my heart's delight, the devotees who worship his feet, the bright young crescent moon, the body like a white lotus that he shares with the Goddess with soft young breasts? When shall I see his eight arms, the beauty of the bright, fragrant matted hair and his throat like a shining dark cloud in which he placed the poison devoured at the contest of the demons and gods? When shall I see and worship the young man who lives in Kāṇappēr of green fields?

ς

When shall I see the majesty of his bull, the cluster of konrai blossoms on his bright fragrant hair, the form he lovingly shares with the Goddess who has a slim waist and a smile white as jasmine? When shall I see the glorious dance he performs in the great hall of Tillai city, the mighty axe, the fire blazing in his hand, the sound of the cymbals played by devotees singing his praise? When shall I see the young man who lives in Kāṇappēr of green fields?

10. Appar IV.80 Köyil (Tillai)

2

The Lord with the holy form rides on a mighty bull.

9, v. 1. "Goddess with soft young breasts": "cūtaṇa meṇmulaiyāļ," literally, "woman with soft breasts which are also high, like the pointed, conical pieces used in gambling boardgames (cūtu)." v. 5. "Cymbals": "kallavaṭam." Judging from the descriptions in the Tevaram, the kallavaṭam seems to be a kind of rhythm instrument with which singers and dancers accompany themselves. It is not clear whether it is a small drum or the kind of castanets that devotees of Hindu gods still use as accompaniment for singing and dancing.

10, v. 2. Appar refers to the famous brahmin community (tillai mūvāyiravar, the three thousand brahmins of Tıllai) attached to the Tillai (Chidambaram) temple. Known as "kōyıl" (the temple), Chidambaram is the great sacred center of Siva's dance. v. 3. Ayan: Brahmā, Māl: Visnu.

The husband of the lovely daughter of the mountain wears the tigerskin. He lives in Cirrampalam in Tillai, home of brahmins who are a blessing for the whole world. I, who have seen his holy feet with these eyes, have nothing left to see.

3
Ayan and Māl worship him every day with flowers and incense and sandal paste, for even they could not behold his form.
I, who have seen with these eyes the cloth of silk on the ash-smeared god in Tillai's golden Cirrampalam, have nothing left to see.

Śiva's Mysteries

11. Campantar II.140 Tiruvānmiyūr

1
You who rule the earth
as the sense within speech, dwelling in Tiruvānmiyūr where fish leap in the salt marsh by the shore on which big waves dash deep-sea conches and white shells, explain the wonder of your joining the mountain's daughter.

2 You who wear the dancer's anklet on your beautiful feet, dwelling in Tiruvānmiyūr, where devotees, deep in meditation,

11. The entire hymn is constructed on the pattern of questions regarding Śiva's wonderful attributes. v. 1. "Sense within speech" echoes the opening verse of Kālidāsa's Sanskrit epic poem Raghuvaṃsa. v. 2. Here "kalal" must mean "foot" and not "warrior's band or anklet," since the kalal is usually worn above the ankle. In his androgynous form, Śiva wears the hero's kalal on one leg, and the woman's anklet (cilampu) on the other. v. 11. "Seeking the grace": read "arul ceyya" instead of "arul ceyta." Cf. Tēvāram Ātīṇam edition.

worship you with sandal paste and cool water and fragrant smoke from aloe sticks, explain the wonder of your taking for your color the sunset's brilliant hue.

3
You who wear a tigerskin and live in Tiruvānmiyūr, where green groves flowing with honey stand close to cool wooded marshes by the sea, explain the wonder of your love for dancing with fire, cloaked in the elephant's hide.

11

Seeking the grace of the Primal Lord who lives in Tiruvāṇmiyūr, Ñāṇacampantaṇ of Kāli, who once received divine wisdom, sang this hymn of question and answer, for the good ascetic who shares his body with the Goddess.
Those who remember these words with pious thoughts will rule the far world of heaven.

The Auspicious Lord

12. Campantar l.98.1 Cirăppalli

My heart rejoices when I sing of the one who has all good things and nothing evil, him who has an old white bull, and Umā as half of himself, the Lord who has the unattainable treasure, and Cirāppalli's hill.

^{12. &}quot;Who has the unattainable treasure": "centralaiyāt tiruv utaiyāṇai", literally, "who has the treasure which one may not obtain by seeking out or pursuing." The phrase "centralaiyāt tiru" (or variants such as "centralaiyāc celtum") occurs frequently in the poems of Appar and Campantar. It describes the nature of release, the implications being that release is the ultimate treasure or wealth, that Siv a alone holds this treasure, that it cannot be won through seeking, and that it can be "attained" only through Siva's grace.

13. Appar IV.8.1

Other than the Lord's name, is there in this world a perfect good, in which all blessings abide? Just think, he is a beggar who wears a hide; over the hide, a snake dances; he eats the food of the poor; his temple is the burning-ground, his dish, a skull. Seeing these blessings, the gods themselves know his nature and honor him in their hearts.

14. Campantar II.221.1 KÖLABU TIRUPPATIKAM (A CHARM AGAINST EVIL PLANETS)

He shares his form with the Goddess whose shoulders curve gracefully like the bamboo. He holds the ocean's poison in his throat, he plays the lute.

Wearing the bright moon and the Ganges on his crown of matted hair, he has entered my heart and abides here.

So let my star be the sun or the moon, Mars or Mercury or Jupiter, let it be Venus, or Saturn, or the two snakes! All the planets and stars are good stars for us, all bring good luck to Siva's devotees!

The Brahmin Lord

15. Campantar II.148.1 Kacci Ekampam

My heart can think of nothing other than the brahmin who is the Veda, he who bears the white moon on his pure, matted red hair, God who is both man and woman,

13. "The food of the poor": "kavaṇalavulla vunku," literally, "food consisting of morsels the size of pebbles."

14. Apart from the stars and planets after which the seven days of the week (nāl) are named, the Hindus include in their list of nine "planets" (navagraha) Rāhu and Ketu, the ascending and descending nodes of the eclipse, portrayed as two halves of a serpent.

15. "The brahmin who is the Veda": "maraiyāṇai" can mean "he who has the Veda," a brahmin; or "he who is the Veda."

the Supreme Lord who dwells in the beautiful shrine of holy Ekampam in Kacci.

16. Campantar II.147.1 - Cirkaļi (Kaļi)

They will find enduring joy, who praise the auspicious god who knows the four Vedas and the six sacred sciences, who is himself the sacred Word recited by scholars of the scripture, who has taken for his home the shrine in Kāli's ancient walled town.

17. Appar IV.30.2 Kalippalai

He gave us the desire for heaven, made us perform the rite of sacrifice. He gave us the music of modes for singing him, made us practice devotion as bhaktas. He granted grace to Māl who spanned the earth with a stride. He placed an eye on his forehead. He is the chieftain of Kalippālai's seashore tract.

18. Campantar I.16.6 Pulamankai

He is the king, a shower of rain for the world. Pure gold, first being, living in grove-encircled Pulamankai, he is my own; he is music, he is like the light of the morning sun. Alanturai is the shrine where he abides.

^{16. &}quot;The six sacred sciences": anga, the six disciplines related to the study of the Veda. 17. "Heaven": the world of Siva where his devotees may join their Lord. "Modes": pan. Mâl: Viṣṇu. Siva is here called "cērppaṇ," a term used in the Tamil classical tradition for rulers of seashore lands.

^{18.} Alanturai is the name of the temple in Pulamankai.

19. Appar VI.311.10 Vinävitaittiruttäntakam (The Täntakam Poem of Question and Answer)

You'd like to say: "Our Lord has long matted hair. He is the one who shares himself with the dark-eyed Goddess. He lives in Kacci Mayanam," but the Lord is more than this. There is no one like him, he isn't any one person, he doesn't live in any one place, and you can't compare him to anything in the world. If it weren't for his grace, you would have no eyes to see his form, his color and nature, you wouldn't be able to say: "This is how he looks; this is his color; this is the way he is; this is God."

2 The Lord Is All Things

(POEMS 20-28)

20. Appar VI.301.1 Civapuram

See the god!
See him who is higher than the gods!
See him who is Sanskrit of the North and southern Tamil and the four Vedas!
See him who bathes in milk and ghee, see the Lord, see him who dances, holding fire, in the wilderness of the burning-ground, see him who blessed the hunter-saint!
See him who wells up as honey in the heart-lotus of his lovers!
See him who has the unattainable treasure!
See Śiva! See him who is our treasure here in Civapuram!

21. Appar IV.54.8 Pukalūr

As water, as fire, as earth, as sky, as the glorious rays of the sun and moon, as the lord v. hom the Himalayan gods supplicate, as the deity hard to comprehend, the Lord of holy Pukalūr, who dances in many places, is the highest god among the gods.

22. Campantar 1.134.4 Pariyalür Virattam

He who has no beginning in birth is the brilliant god who makes the beginning and end, and the birth and flourishing of those who are born.

20. "He who has the unattainable treasure": "centataryāc celvan." See note to Poem 12 above. The "hunter-saint": Kannappar.
22. "Fierce spirits": "virar pāritam."

He is the god who lives surrounded by fierce spirits in the Vīraṭṭam shrine of the splendid holy town of Pariyalūr.

23. Appar VI.308 Ninra tiruttäntakam (The Täntakam Poem of the Lord Who Stands)

As wide earth, as fire and water, as sacrificer and wind that blows, as eternal moon and sun, as ether, as the eight-formed god, as cosmic good and evil, woman and man, all other forms, and his own form, and all these as himself, as yesterday and today and tomorrow, the god of the long red hair stands, O wonder!

As rock, as hill, as forest, as river, as streams and small canals, as salt marshes by the sea, as grass, as bush, as plants and herbs, as the city, as the one who smashed the three cities, as the word, as meaning in the word, as the stirring of all life, as the places where life stirs, as grain, as the earth in which it grows, as the water that gives it life, the Lord who blazed up as the great flame stands, O wonder!

24. Appar IV.48 Āppāți

1
The Lord of Āppāṭi
who wears the blooming konrai in his hair, is manifest

23. Verse 3 in particular vividly presents the concept of Siva as immanent in all life forms, moving and still. A similar description in Tiruvācakam 1.26–30 has several verbal echoes ("pullākip pūṭāki..."). The images are closely associated with the imagery of Rudra as the god of plant life and the great healer in the Śatarudrīya.

as the seven seas, wind, all-embracing ether, life's breath in the body, earth and bright fire, the light of the day, and the cool moon of evenings fragrant with flowers.

The Lord of Āppāṭi
whose spouse shares half his form,
is manifest
as the chants of the Veda,
as the meaning of the chant,
as the friend of those who sing melodious songs;
the god with the eye on his forehead is the very love that those who love him feel.

7
The Lord of Āppāṭi
is both inside and outside,
form and no-form.
He is both the flood and the bank,
he is the broad-rayed sun.
Himself the highest mystery,
he is in all hidden thoughts.
He is thought and meaning, and embraces all who embrace him.

25. Appar VI.243.1 Tiruvārūrt tiruttāņṭakam (The Tāṇṭakam Poem of the Lord in Tiruvārūr) Tiruvārūr (Ārūr)

The gorgeous gem, delicious honey, milk, the sweet taste of sugar cane, clear sugar syrup, precious gem, the sound of flute, drum, cymbals, and lute, great gem, coral, pure gold and pearl, the crest jewel of Paruppatam hill, rare gem who destroys our sin, our Lord in Ārūr—
I was a dog, who once failed to know and remember him.

^{25. &}quot;Precious gem": "kurumani," "precious or priceless gem," can also mean "a rare teacher (guru)." "Paruppatam hill": "paruppatam," Sanskrit parvata, can signify any hill or mountain, but in the Tècuram hymns it most often refers to Śriśailam (Śri-parvata) in the Andhra area. In this hymn Appar is speaking of his past as a Jain monk.

26. Appar VI.261.1 Avațuturai

My treasure and good fortune, Lord sweet as honey, golden flame of heaven, O form of blazing light, my friend, my flesh, heart within my flesh, soul within my heart, wish-fulfilling tree, my eye, dark pupil in the eye, image that dances within! Save me from the hidden disease of karma, bull among the gods, you who live in cool Āvaṭuturai!

The Cosmic Person

27. Appar IV.4.8 Tiruvārūr (Ārūr)

The god who has a thousand red lotuses, a thousand shoulders like a thousand golden hills, a thousand long strands of hair like a thousand suns, and has taken for himself a thousand names, is our Lord who lives in Ārūr.

28. Appar VI.229 Karukāvūr

1
He is my bright diamond, good days, and auspicious stars, and evil planets, too.
He is ambrosia untasted, butter in milk, juice in the fruit, melody in song.
With Umā as half his self, he is

27. This verse evokes the vision of the Lord as the Cosmic Person (Puruşa) as described in the Vedic Puruşasükta (Rig Veda X.90) and the Bhagavadgītā (XI.9-12). It also refers back to the praise of Rudra-Śiva in the Vedic Śatarudrīya litany. Appar's comparison of Śiva's tawny hair with the sun, or rather, the sun's rays, echoes one of the Sanskrit epithets of the sun: "sahasra-raśmi," "the thousand-rayed one."

28, v. 1 This refers to the Hindu belief that the planets (kōl), days, and the "stars" (lunar asterisms, nāl) by which days are identified have evil influences on human lives. See Poem 14. "Speech on my tongue": "nāvirku uraiyāṭi," literally, "speaker on my tongue, the one who makes me speak." Siva is also the eye that the world sees. v. 7. Ātirai: The day associated with the asterism Tiruvātirai (Ātirai) in the month of Mārkali in the Tamil luni-solar calendar is sacred to Siva. See Appar's description of the Tiruvātirai festival in Tiruvārūr in Poem 98.

speech on my tongue. My Father in Karukāvūr is the source of all things and the eye that beholds the world.

He is the seed, he the sprout and root;
True friend to his devotees, he takes the forms we desire.
Milk-white god, the refuge we seek,
he is the supreme Light.
He conceals himself from all the gods in heaven who praise him, yet dwells within my heart.
My Father in Karukāvūr is the eye that reveals all things to me, his devotee.

My Lord is the flower and its color, the King who dwells as fragrance within the flower. The Lord who shares his form with the lady of the beautiful bracelets is the god of all the true faiths, and brings endless pain to those who do not praise him. Dwelling in my heart, he saved me from Death. My Father in Karukāvūr is my eye.

None can fully grasp the greatness of his manifestations as the creator of the universe,
as the god who dug into the earth.
He smashed the enemy's three citadels, burning them with terrible fire.
He bears the trident, axe, and snake,
and rides the bull.
Absent from evil hearts,
My Father in Karukāvūr
is my eye.

7 A snake encircles his waist, he sits under the banyan tree, the Ātirai is his festival day.
The cosmic gods themselves honor the sacred crown on which he bears the moon.
Destroyer of karma, he dwells in my thoughts, and in every human heart on this wide-famed earth. He who shares his form with Umā drank the poison that arose from the surging sea. My Father in Karukāvūr is my eye.

He is drum and drumbeat, the measure of all speech.
The ash-smeared god, the supreme Light, destroyer of our sin, is our one path to release.
The Lord who kicked at terrible Death firmly eludes evil men—they can't see him.
My Father in Karukâvūr, is my eye.

He burned the enemy's three cities with terrible fire; pressing down on the arrogant demon, in an instant he crushed his ten heads, then graciously listened to his sweet songs. He quelled the five senses, he felled Death with his foot, he is the mantra that gives us release. My Father in Karukāvūr is my eye.

Națarāja: Lord of the Dance

(POEMS 29-36)

டுளிற்ற படுவமும் வைல்லை வைவ்வர்யும் கிற்பும் एमिन् किम्मानिक एमान्द्रिणमं हिल्लीपीकं एमलं निमलंग्नी मुं

29. Appar IV.81.4 Köyil (Tıllai)

If you could see the arch of his brow, the budding smile on lips red as the kovvai fruit, cool matted hair. the milk-white ash on coral skin. and the sweet golden foot raised up in dance, Dologio 2002 pool of anny unalling then even human birth on this wide earth Lowin Govern would become a thing worth having.

30. Campantar I.39.1 Vēţkalam (Tiruvēţkalam)

When our Lord who is both end and beginning dances to the deep sound of the mulavam drum, holding blazing fire in the hollow of his hand, as the mountain's daughter watches, the Ganga's murmuring stream with foaming waves flows over the cool crescent moon. He who smears his body with ash from the burning-ground is our Lord who dwells in Vētkalam's fine town.

^{29.} A very popular verse, describing Śiva as Natarāja, the Cosmic Dancer. "Paņitta" (dewy, full of waterdrops) refers to the cool waters of the Ganges which run through Siva's hair; hence "cool" matted hair. "Pon" in "porpatam" ("golden foot") is a term of endear-

^{30.} The poet describes the effect of Siva's vigorous dancing on the river and moon that he bears on his matted hair. The alliteration in this verse nicely evokes the sounds of the Ganges and the drum: "cantam :lanku nakutalai kankai," "mantamulavam iyampa," The verse begins with the phrase "end and beginning," "antamum ātiyum," significantly placing Siva's destructive function first, since it is the basis of his role as creator,

The Dance in the Burning-Ground

31. Appar IV.2.6 Atikai Virațțănam

We belong to him whose light is the flickering firebrand in the burning-ground; the throbbing beat of the tuţi drum and his host of eighteen kinds of spirits surround him; the Vedic song that few may learn, and, on the stage, the dance that even the learned may not know—all these, and the broad Keţilam river, are his. We fear nothing; there is nothing for us to fear.

32. Campantar I.134.5 Pariyalūr Vīraţţam

The skullbearer who dances in the burning-ground for the dead, the god who dances the paţutam dance in the cremation-ground, is the Lord of the Vīraṭṭam shrine in Paṛiyalūr of blossoming groves and wise scholars of the sacred Veda.

33. Appar IV.121.1 Ārūr

The Lord of Ārūr, who wears the akṣa beads along with the snake, is the dancer who delights in performing to the band of attendant goblins with gaping mouths, who play the kokkarai and flute, the lute and the koṭukoṭṭi drum.

31, 32. In these and other descriptions of Śiva's dance in the cremation-ground, the Tamil saints effectively portray him as the god of paradox who encompasses both the Vedic ceremony and the shamanistic dance, as the auspicious god who renders even the place of death pure.

33. "Aksa": Tamil akku; the Rudrākṣa (Rudra's eye) seeds sacred to Śiva, worn by devotees and used as rosaries.

34. Appar IV.80.1 Koyil (Tillai)

If there are men who want to see anything in the world other than the dance of Aran, whose feet we serve, in Cirrampalam shrine in Tillai, where the arecca tree with broad fronds grows tall, the streets are lined with great mansions, and all the fields are watered by streams full of vāļai fish—then they are but devil-devotees, seeing worthless things with rheumy eyes.

35. Appar IV.92.9 Aiyaru

See the holy feet of Aiyāru's Lord, feet that dance in the burning-ground for rotting corpses, making the earth heave, as the parantai and the montai drum resound, bands of ghosts gather around the mulavam drum and strike its curved head, and jackals provide the long, high wail of the flute.

36. Campantar 1.46 Atıkai Virattanam

I Surrounded by short, fat goblins, holding fire in his hand and wearing a garland of full-blown konrai flowers, the Lord dances, as bees sing the Marul mode, in Atikai Vīraṭṭāṇam on the northern bank of Keṭilam's clear stream where keṇṭai fish leap.

2
He waves the fire lifted up in his hand;
the strands of flame-red hair
adorned with konrai blossoms thick with bees
sway, as he dances

35. "Ghosts": "pey." The spirits of the dead which inhabit the cremation ground, and serve as Siva's attendants. Following the Tevaram Pondicherry edition I read "montai" (a drum' instead of "antai" (owl). "Paranțai" is an obscure word; it seems to indicate a musical instrument. See the Tanul Lexicon, 36, v. 4. The heads of the mulas u, a concert drum that is the ancestor of the contemporary South Indian mudangam drum, were smeared with black paste to give it resonance.

with the Goddess with speech sweet as sugar cane and soft breasts like tender coconuts or lotus buds, in his beloved Atikai's Vīraṭṭāṇam shrine.

The great deadly snake at his waist dances along as he who is skilled in the Vedic chant, he who performs the paţutam dance on his begging rounds and takes many forms, dances in the Vīraṭṭāṇam shrine in Atikai, where the moon rests on the rooftops.

The Lord who destroyed the demon forts dances, in the Vīraṭṭāṇam shrine in Atikai, crowned with the young moon and holding fire in his hand, to the sound of drums smeared with black paste, to the melodious chant of the Veda, and the praise-songs of all the gods in heaven.

The Lord who holds fire and bears the broad river on his head dances, trailing strands of fire-red matted hair, in the burning-ground for the dead in the gutted, desolate outskirts of the blessed town of Atikai, "blessed" because all good fortune is rooted here, and will not leave the Vīraṭṭāṇam shrine.

The god crowned with the bright moon dances, playing with flickering fire in the hollow of his hand and singing with Umā who is graceful as a tender vine, in the Vīraṭṭāṇam shrine in Atikai, place of fertile fields encircled by streams.

7 The supreme Lord, the highest Deity,

34. Appar IV.80.1 Koyil (Tillai)

If there are men who want to see anything in the world other than the dance of Aran, whose feet we serve, in Cirrampalam shrine in Tillai, where the arecca tree with broad fronds grows tall, the streets are lined with great mansions, and all the fields are watered by streams full of vāļai fish—then they are but devil-devotees, seeing worthless things with rheumy eyes.

35. Appar IV.92.9 Aiyaru

See the holy feet of Aiyāru's Lord, feet that dance in the burning-ground for rotting corpses, making the earth heave, as the parautai and the montai drum resound, bands of ghosts gather around the mulavam drum and strike its curved head, and jackals provide the long, high wail of the flute.

36. Campantar I.46 Atikai Vīraţţāṇam

1
Surrounded by short, fat goblins, holding fire in his hand and wearing a garland of full-blown konrai flowers, the Lord dances, as bees sing the Marul mode,
in Atikai Vīraṭṭāṇam on the northern bank of Keṭilam's clear stream where keṇṭai fish leap.

2
He waves the fire lifted up in his hand;
the strands of flame-red hair
adorned with konrai blossoms thick with bees
sway, as he dances

35. "Ghosts": "pēy." The spirits of the dead which inhabit the cremation ground, and serve as Śiva's attendants. Following the Tēvāram Pondicherry edition I read "montal" (a drum) instead of "antal" (owl). "Parantal" is an obscure word; it seems to indicate a musical instrument. See the Tamil Lexicon.

36, v. 4. The heads of the mulavu, a concert drum that is the ancestor of the contemporary South Indian mulangum drum, were smeared with black paste to give it resonance.

with the Goddess with speech sweet as sugar cane and soft breasts like tender coconuts or lotus buds, in his beloved Atikai's Vīraṭṭāṇam shrine.

The great deadly snake at his waist dances along as he who is skilled in the Vedic chant, he who performs the patutam dance on his begging rounds and takes many forms, dances in the Vīraṭṭāṇam shrine in Atikai, where the moon rests on the rooftops.

The Lord who destroyed the demon forts dances, in the Vīraṭṭāṇam shrine in Atikai, crowned with the young moon and holding fire in his hand, to the sound of drums smeared with black paste, to the melodious chant of the Veda, and the praise-songs of all the gods in heaven.

The Lord who holds fire and bears the broad river on his head dances, trailing strands of fire-red matted hair, in the burning-ground for the dead in the gutted, desolate outskirts of the blessed town of Atikai, "blessed" because all good fortune is rooted here, and will not leave the Vīraṭṭāṇam shrine.

The god crowned with the bright moon dances, playing with flickering fire in the hollow of his hand and singing with Umā who is graceful as a tender vine, in the Vīraṭṭāṇam shrine in Atikai, place of fertile fields encircled by streams.

7
The supreme Lord, the highest Deity,

Primal Being of the Veda, surrounded by his band of spirits and clad in tigerskin, dances as Umä sings and devotees praise his feet, in the Vīraṭṭāṇam shrine on Keṭilam's northern bank.

8

The bowman who shot at the citadels, he who swiftly subdued the demon, crushing the power of the huge arms with which he lifted the rocky hill, and then granted him grace, dances, wearing skulls bleached white, with open mouths and grinning teeth, in the Vīraṭṭāṇam shrine in Atikai.

a

The Strider and the four-headed god could not behold the ever-growing form of the Lord with the ash-smeared chest and sacred thread, who dances, holding a stinking skull, in the Vīraṭṭāṇam shrine in Atikai where fragrant blue waterlilies bloom.

10

Clad in asoka leaves or with no clothes at all, bearing a beggar's water jug and dry gourd for dish, they toil; their doctrines are self-contradictory, but our Lord who is joined with Umā wears a garland of fragrant flowers, and dances in the Vīraṭṭāṇam shrine.

11

They will be rid of karma who consider as their life support the Tamil garland that Nāṇacampantan from Kāli, town fragrant with seaside nālal trees, has composed on the all-embracing feet, adorned with the hero's band, of the Lord of Atikai Vīraṭṭāṇam, whose clear stream is lined with banks of reeds.

4 Bhikṣāṭana: The Beggar

(POEMS 37-39)

37. Campantar I.40.1 Vāļkoļiputtūr

With ash-smeared breast, he rides on the bull.
Followed by his band of spirits, he wanders through towns with sacred flags, begging for food, chanting the beggar's call.
Let us offer fragrant flowers and behold the feet of the god with the dark throat, who lives in Vālkoliputtūr with lovely Umā, whose long eyes curve like swords, as half his self.

38. Campantar II.138 Valanculi

O dazzling light praised by your devoted servants in Valañculi where bees sing, drunk on cool fragrant honey flowing out of blossoming flowers, tell me why you once wandered about as a beggar, singing songs.

37. "God with the dark throat": "karaik kantan," literally, "he whose throat is stained dark [with the poison he drank at the churning of the ocean]." The beggar's cry: "Ladies, give me alms," is quoted in other verses in this hymn.

38, v. 2. "Large white egret": "paral venkuruku." "Heron": "nārai." See B. L. Samy, Canka ilakkiyattil pulļina viļakkam, (Madras: SISSW Publishing Society, 1976), chs. 2, 4. v. 3. "Full-bloomed lotuses": "kiņņavanņamalkun kiļar tāmarai," literally, "lotuses that flourish, blooming like cups"; "-malkum" is the reading in the Tēvāram Pondicherty edition. v. 6. Ponņi: the river Kaveri. The Pūcam festival is celebrated on the day of the asterism Pūcam in the month of Tai. Bathing in rivers is the focal ceremony of this festival.

O god bright with a budding white smile, you who live in Valañculi where the large white egret and the heron with open bill look for prey among surging white waves, tell me why you roamed the world, carrying a dank white skull.

3
O you who smear the chalk-white ash
all over your body, and live in Valañculi
where the wild goose walks on fine sand, colored gold from the pollen of full-bloomed lotuses, tell me why, though the gods themselves praised you,
you begged for alms in a white skull.

O treasure and light who holds the little fawn, living in Valañculi
where you end the troubles of those who bathe in Ponni's swelling current, fragrant with many flowers,
on the festival day of Pūcam,
tell me, why this pretense of poverty,
this begging with a disgusting white skull?

39. Appar VI.223 Amāttūr

1 He came to us singing songs in varied rhythms, and took us by force.

39. In this hymn Appar plays on the popular conception of Bhikṣāṭana, the "Beggar Lord," as a seducer of married women. He also uses the conventions of classical akam love poetry; the speaker in the poem is a woman who has fallen in love with the handsome beggar. The mythological context of the scene is Siva's seduction of the wives of the Pine Forest sages. v. 1. "Vannam": a type of musical composition with complex rhythms, or the method of singing a composition in several tempos or with rhythmic variation. v. 9. "Axe": the "kallalaku," "a sharp weapon," is different from the battle-axe (maļu) that Siva carries. In some hymns it is mentioned along with the kaṭṭaṅkam (khaṭvāṅga), a weapon made of bone.

He shot the arrows of his eyes at us; with speeches that stir up passion he skillfully seduced us, made us sick with love. The skullbearer god has mounted his swift bull; wearing a skin, his body covered with white ash, a sacred thread adorning his form, come, see the Master as he goes riding where all can see him. The Lord of Āmāttūr is a handsome man, indeed!

When he lingered at my door, wearing the white ash, his spreading matted hair crowned with a white wreath, singing the Kāntāram mode to the vīṇā's tune, I asked: "What is your town, O man with the throat dark as a sapphire?" Pretending to be in pain, he entered my house. Then, saying, "O girl with the slim waist, if you wish to know my town, I'll tell you—it is Āmāttūr, where bees buzz on the cool lotus flower," the Lord disappeared.

Bearing the axe, the skullbearer came riding on a swift bull; making sweet speeches, he entered our homes; he won't take alms from us, nor will he leave. Instead, he speaks only deceptions and wiles, as if to seduce all who look at him. The Lord of Āmāttūr, who will neither accept the petty alms we offer him, nor reveal his designs, is a handsome man, indeed!

The white bull he rides is in no way inferior to rolling chariots, horses, and elephants. The dark-throated one with the fiery red form, the god whom the Himalayan gods praise, owns no wealth, yet is a rich man. The Lord of Āmāttūr, who wears a tigerskin, and a garland of cool blossoms, and rides surrounded by his demons, is a handsome man indeed!

Я

We agree that you ride a truly excellent white bull. Tell me, do you come from a town called Orriyūr? Why do you stay? Or, if you wish to go, why have you seduced us with a glance of your forehead-eye?

O you who always torment us thus, we think we know your town—

Ekampam is its name.

Surely you leave us in anger, my Lord!

Our Lord of Āmāttūr is a handsome man, indeed!

In plain sight of all, the man from Kāļatti who carries a sharp axe mounted his swift bull, appeared at my door, entered my house, and begged for alms. Yet when I rose to meet him, he disappeared without a proper farewell. "What town do you really come from? Is it Turutti, or Palaṇam, or Neyttāṇam?" The Lord of Āmāttur, who has left me to suffer, is a handsome man, indeed!

5 Śiva's Myths

(POEMS 40-54)

The Linga of Fire

40. Campantar I.100.9 Parankungam (Tirupparankungam)

Parankungu is the shrine of the Lord who shares his body with the girl who plays with a ball, the god who rose
as a splendid column of light, whose greatness was beyond the grasp even of Māl who in a single stride once spanned this whole earth, and the ancient god who emerged from his bright navel, and gave the sacred Vedas to the world.

41. Appar IV.20.10 Tiruvārūr (Ārūr)

Ayan of the lotus flower and the god who dismembered Iraniyan sought to know him; but for all their seeking, they could not contain in their vision our Lord who was the great flame. Entering the hearts of devotees who sing and worship him, and chant the Palläntu hymns for him, I have sought and found that Lord of Tiruvärür.

40. "The girl who plays with a ball": "pantiyalankai mankai"; the Goddess is portrayed as a very young girl. "Ancient god": uravon, Brahma, "the elder, the ancient one."

41. Ayan: aja, "the unborn," Brahmā. Viṣṇu, in his man-lion (Narasimha) incarnation, dismembered the demon Iraniyan (Hiranyakasipu). Pallāntu hymns: see Poem 5.

The Three Cities

42. Campantar l.11.6 Vilimilalai

When the gods cried, "Save us from peril, O Lord seated under the ancient banyan tree!"
the celestial beings united to become his chariot; Ayan, the creator, yoked the Vedas as horses;
the world-mountain became the bow,
its string was the great snake.
Māl was the arrow, with wind for its feathers.
With swiftly kindled fire he shot at the citadels.
Vīlimilalai is his abode.

Mārkandeya and Death

43. Appar IV.31.9 Kaţavûr Vīratţam

Resisting the charms of women with eyes curved like the cēl fish, Mārkaṇḍeya became Śiva's devotee, bathing his God every day in streams of milk, and good yoghurt and ghee, seeking thus to put an end to the pain of ignorant life. It was for him that the Lord of the Vīraṭṭam shrine in Kaṭavūr once kicked at Death.

44. Campantar 1.52.3 Neţunkaļam

You who live in Neţunkalam, end the karma of your servants who bring water and flowers for your worship every day, always singing the praise of your golden foot with which, O pure one, when he who faithfully served at your feet invoked you,

42. The gods invoke Siva in his form as Daksinamurti, the wise teacher, who is "seated under the banyan tree,"

^{43. &}quot;The pain of ignorant life": "maruṭṭuyar," the pain of an existence caused and characterized by ignorance about the nature of pacu, pati, and pācam. Tirukkaṭavūr, one of the eight Vīraṭṭāṇam sites, is said to be the place where Siva rescued Mārkaṇḍeya from death (see illus. 12).

you kicked at terrible Death, crying: "You shall not take my devotee's life!"

45. Appar IV.50.1 Kurukkai Vîrattam

He whose foot and head neither Māl the Strider nor Brahmā could see, though they searched into the depths of the universe covered with flood waters, is our Lord of the Vīraṭṭam shrine in Kurukkai, who became a rude hunter for the sake of Arjuna, and gave him a bow and arrow, sacred mantras, and a chariot with fluttering flags.

Daksināmūrti, the Teacher

46. Campantar I.132.1 Vilimilalai

The temple of the god who sat under the tall banyan tree, and graciously taught the four ancient sages the enlightened way by discoursing on the essence of the four true Vedas, is Milalai, where parrots in groves flowing with honey, hearing the sound of famed pundits daily reciting the sacred texts, explain the meaning of the chant.

Rāvaņa and Kailāsa

47. Appar IV.39.10 Aiyāgu (Tiruvaiyāgu)

When the ignorant demon tried to lift the great hill, he felt faint;

45. The second half of the verse refers to the Mahābhārata episode of Arjuna's combat with Siva, who challenged him disguised as a hunter. "The depths of the universe / covered with flood waters": the Ātīṇam commentator takes "nīr enum pilayam" to mean "the netherworld" (pātāla) (cf. Tēvāram Ātīṇam edition). "Rude": "tuṭiyuṭai," rough, aggressive, insulting.

47, 48. These two verses are typical of the final verse in Appar's hymns, which he regularly dedicates to the legend of Rāvana's effort to uproot Mount Kailāsa (see illus. 11). In seeing his pain, the wise god pressed down with his little toe, till the demon was crushed, and fell down on the earth; yet when he gained wisdom, the Lord who dwells as honey in Aiyāru blessed him with his grace.

48. Appar IV.80.10 Köyil (Tillaı)

When the arrogant demon, proud of the strength of his arms, roared, and lifted the great hill with his mountainous shoulders, the spouse of the mountain's daughter, the Lord of Tillai's beautiful Ampalam hall, laughed, and bore down with his toe to crush the demon's ten crowned heads. I, who have seen that toe with these eyes, have nothing left to see.

49. Campantar 1.72.8 Kuṭantaik Kārōṇam

The Lord first bore down on the mountain with the tip of his sweet-smelling foot, crushing the many hill-like shoulders and all ten heads of the proud and terrible demon. Then, pleased to hear him sing the sacred hymn, he granted him a bright sword. Such is the Lord of Kārōṇam shrine in cool Kuṭantai upon Ponni's fertile banks.

the Tevaram hymns as a whole, and in Appar's verses in particular, Rāvaṇa appears as the paradigm for the repentant sinner who is redeemed by the infinite grace of the Lord. Appar's special tondness for the Rāvaṇa myth is perhaps explained by his feelings of guilt regarding his past as a Jain monk; the saint's sense of identification with Rāvaṇa comes across very powerfully in his hymns. The Tamil tradition has tended to treat Rāvaṇa with greater sympathy than have the other regional traditions of India; Rāvaṇa has even been featured as the "hero" of the Rāmayaṇa story in recent interpretations of the epic. For a discussion of the role of the demon-devotee in Tamil myth, see Shulman, Tamil Temple Myths, ch. 5.

49. "Sacred hymn": "uran ar kitam," the melodious Vedic (Sāman) chant. Kārōṇam: Sanskrit "Kavarōhana," one of the shrines associated with the Pāsupata sect.

50. Appar IV.19.11 Ārūr (Tiruvārūr)

He bore down with his precious toe, so that the cloud-covered mountain shook, and the shoulders of the invincible warrior, the wicked demon, were crushed, and red streams of blood from his wounds bathed his frame, while the Lord himself wore the cool powder of milk-white ash on his chest. I saw that Lord in Ārūr.

51. Appar VI.310

He cured my disease and took me for his own, he took Atikai Vīraṭṭāṇam for his domain. He severed the head of Brahmā, god of the lotus seat, and took the skull for his begging bowl. He drained all the blood from arrogant Vāmana's giant frame, took up the deer in his left hand, and the battle-axe in the right. The skullbearer took Kāma's body with a glance, and from Kaṇṇappaṇ he took loving service.

3
He wears a crown of matted hair, bears the waxing moon and the winding snake on his head.
He wears the ringing anklet

50. "Invincible": "tuñcāppōr," "tireless in combat."

51. This is a hymn in which the poet builds the entire hymn around the shades of meaning of a verb. The key word in this poem is "kontār," "he took" (from kol, "to take"). Appar contrasts the things Siva has taken from him—his disease, ignorance, himself—with the objects he has taken from others, in the context of myth. The mythological references include: the decapitation of Brahmā and the burning of Kāma, the god of Love (v. 1), Siva's drinking of Viṣṇu's blood (v. 1) and his subsequent wandering over the universe in his form as Kaṅkāļa, with the skeleton of Viṣṇu's doorkeeper slung over this shoulder. Verse 3 contains one of the few references in the Tevāram to "muyalakan" (apasmārapuruṣa, "the demon of forgetfulness or ignorance"), the dwarflike figure on whose body Siva dances as Natarāja, Lord of the Dance. In the same verse, Appar refers to Siva as Harshara, the form in which he is united with Viṣṇu (Māl). The "Cuntaran" of verse 5 is probably the mythical Ālālacuntaran who was said to have been born on earth as the poet-saint Cuntaramūrtti.

and the sounding hero's band on his legs, he cast defiant muyalakan under his foot. In his right hand he bears the sharp battle-axe, and holds Māl in loving embrace in the left half of his frame. He carries a bundle of bones on his shoulder, and the tuți drum in his hand. He cured my painful disease and took possession of me.

S
He pierced Andhaka with his sharp trident, and yoked the sacred Vedas as horses to his chariot.
He took Cuntaran for his fanbearer and friend,
and the burning-ground as stage for his dance.
He bent the Mandara mountain into his bow,
and took Mākāļan for his gatekeeper.
He revealed himself in the Veda and Āgama texts, ended my days as a Jain, and took me for his own.

He cut off the head of the sacrifice, and took Bhaga's eye.
He knocked off the Aditya's teeth, and severed the head of the arrogant priest of the rite.
He cut off powerful Agni's arm, and the foot of mighty Yama, guardian of the sacrifice, and he kicked at the Moon.
Thus he destroyed insolent Dakşa's sacrifice, striking fear into every heart.
He is the pure one who has taken me for his own.

52. Appar IV.14 TACAPURĂŅAM (THE TEN MYTHS)

When the Himalayan gods let go of the snake coiled around the great hill, and ran in fear as the poison, [&]quot;In the Veda and Agama": "tantiramantirattarāy"; cf. Campantar 1.61.3 ("mantirattān tantirattān") and Appar VI.268.8 (Poem 118). Verse 9 is devoted to a detailed description of Siva's destruction of the sacrifice conducted by his arrogant father-in-law Dakṣa. In this verse, I have taken "meccan viyattiran" as referring to the officiating priest. Appar also refers several times to his reconversion to Saivism.

^{52.} In this hymn Appar celebrates ten important myths in the Tamil Śaiva tradition, v. 3. "The six faiths": the six sectarian groups in the Hindu classical tradition, each taking a darker than Tirumāl's body, shot out in a powerful stream and burned the sky, they cried: "Save us, O Lord!" The one who was moved to compassion, and devoured the deadly poison, to shield them from harm, is the King of the highest gods.

When the roaring flood waters rose and covered the great worlds, a column arose on earth, that was the Supreme Deity itself; then Brahmā and Māl, exclaiming, "He is incomparable!" bowed on both sides, having found neither head nor foot of the Great One, the first and highest God, who took form as Śiva—He is our only refuge.

Before the creation of Time, measured in days and eons,
the fiery god stood as the One,
then became the three gods
and took form as the six faiths.
He it was who swallowed earth with heaven and all seven worlds, became the dwarf,
the infant who floated on the banyan leaf, and the high god to all these—
That Lord is our only refuge.

particular deity for the center of its cultic focus. Other possible interpretations: six different religious traditions; six sects within Śaivism (akaccamayam); the six "schools" (darsana) of Indian philosophy. This verse presents the Tamil Śaiva conception of creation, with Śiva playing the supreme role, as the material cause of the universe as well as its creator and animating principle. In this progression, Śiva is precosmic Being and the three cosmic gods, as well as the Supreme Deity. It is in this sense that Viṣṇu's deeds of becoming the dwarf and the infant are attributed to Śiva. See the discussion of the sixfold classifications and of creation from the Śaiva Siddhānta point of view in Sivaraman, Śaivism, chs. 1, 3. v. 5. Ari: Viṣṇu, Māl. v. 10: This myth of Tirumāl's worship of Śiva is often narrated in the Tēvāram hymns.

When all seven worlds, high heaven, and earth with its long seashores and mountains, were oppressed, the Himalayan gods sang his praise, lifting up their hands in prayer.

The god who dances with fire then split open the body of the fleeing demon Tāraka and danced the great dance to quench his undying fury—His feet are our only refuge.

When the three citadels, unmoored, flew about wreaking destruction in heaven and on earth, oppressed by their assault, the frightened gods, led by Ari himself, sought his protection.

Then, moved to compassion, the gracious savior kindled his deadly arrow with fire, shot fire from the snake that was his bowstring, bent his mountain-bow to its fullest, and reduced the citadels to ashes—

He is our only refuge.

It was the day that dark-hued, red-eyed Death with curved white tusks and flaming hair came looking for him: as he performed the morning worship with fresh flowers, Kāla came near, and pursued with his life-grabbing noose the boy who fled in fear.

The Lord's feet which sent that Death to his own end are the feet that the gods worship and praise and place on their heads.

7
Seeing the terrible fate of the Himalayan gods, of the frightened Lord of the Sacrifice, of Fire and of the Moon, who came for their share of the offering at pious Dakṣa's great sacrifice, Ayan and Māl, themselves gripped by fear, withdrew, begging, "Forgive our ignorance and other faults," and the fire-hued Lord emerged victorious. To see and know the feet of that Lord, my Father, is the way.

When the Goddess, lady of all blessings, ran up to him in play and covered his eyes with her hands, darkness engulfed all seven worlds, and to dispel the dark, an eye blossomed on his forehead; upon which, the frightened young woman uncovered the other eyes, and begged for mercy. The three-eyed god who then graciously opened his moon- and blazing sun-eyes is our only refuge.

At Indra's command, impelled by cloud-dark Māl, the god with five arrows conjured up spring in the sugar-cane grove, with cooing cuckoos and a soft breeze. When Madana had shot his flower arrow at him, fire blazed forth from the forehead-eye of our fire-hued father, burning to ashes the god's handsome form, and terrifying the Himalayan gods—The Lord is our only refuge.

When Tirumāl, missing a single flower of the thousand lotuses needed for the rite, offered his eye in place of the flower, much pleased, our Father, the Lord, gave the god of the ocean the mighty wheel of deadly power that he had once with great effort set spinning with his bright foot, till it split open the demon's heart. That Lord is our only refuge.

11

"Your swift chariot will not run on Kailāsa hill, give up your bravado, Don't urge me on! Don't break the sacred Law!"
Harshly chiding the charioteer who spoke thus to him, the demon commanded: "Drive on!"
When, going faster forward,
he reached the hill and tried to lift it,
his head and shoulders cracked and gave way,
crushed by the toe of my Lord's foot,
which my heart remembers.

53. Appar IV.73 Cerai

After the daughter of rich Himalaya had parted from him, he married her again for her many arduous penances and gave her half of himself, taking on a glorious new form. He is our treasure in Cērai, shrine of the good path.

2
Falling for the wiles of wicked Jains who do not have the discrimination to see the Truth as it is,
I took their words for true,
and wallowed in them,
till he wrenched me free, took possession of me,

53. The ninth verse of this hymn is not available. "Cenneri," in the refrain of the hymn ("cenneric celvaṇār"), is the name of the shrine at Cērai. The word also means "the good path," the path to release through total devotion to Siva in the Tamil Saiva mode. The "treasure" is, of course, release, but in the context of devotion, it is Siva himself as the desired goal. v. 1. Appar relates the story of Siva's marriage to Umā or Pārvatī. Dakṣa's daughter Sati, wife of Siva, committed suicide at Dakṣa's sacrifice, embittered by her father's insulting treatment of her husband. She was reborn as Pārvatī, daughter of the mountain Himalaya, and gained Siva for her husband after performing severe penance, involving many ascetic practices. The wedding of Siva and Pārvatī is the subject of Kālidāsa's Sanskrit epic poem Kumārasaṃbhava and is a popular subject in South Indian temple sculpture and iconography. v. 2. "Wicked Jains": "kunṭar." The word "kunṭar," which the poets frequently use to describe the Jain and Buddhist monks, can mean either "scoundrels, wicked men," or "fat, degenerate men."

healed me of earthly sickness and the disease of existence itself.

He is our treasure in Cērai, shrine of the good path.

3
He willingly went to the dreadful forest as the hunter who defeated in combat Arjuna of the long bow, and thus favored him, for he had stood for a long time in single-minded penance and worshipped his God's feet.
He is our treasure in Cērai, shrine of the good path.

For Bhagīratha
who had performed strict penance, firmly subduing the five senses,
he bore lightly on his red hair
the Ganges which descended with force in many angry streams.
He is our treasure in Cērai, shrine of the good path.

The young man who piled the sand high and poured fresh milk on his God with love, cut off the foot of his father who had kicked out at the Lord.
Right then, Siva gave to the boy the good name
"beautiful Caṇṭīcaṇ, the 'angry one.'"
He is our treasure in Cēṛai, shrine of the good path.

As terrible Bhairava of the end of Time bearing the flashing trident and the drum with the deafening roar, he flayed the elephant and laughed aloud, terrifying Umā. He is our treasure in Cērai, shrine of the good path.

When the Himalayan gods surrounded our Lord, strewed flowers, praised him, and cried, "Save us!" at once he graciously went forth, to burn in an instant, with terrible flames, the three solid citadels in the sky. He is our treasure in Cerai, shrine of the good path.

Making him who once created this entire universe, and Māl himself, cry: "You are our sole Lord!" and beg for mercy, and praise him, he showed himself as infinite light, red fire, a column of which they could tell neither beginning nor end. He is our treasure in Cērai, shrine of the good path.

When the demon of unequaled power tried to lift the great hill and felt his majestic heads and strong shoulders give way, moved to love, he cried, "My Lord," and the Lord gently lifted his flower-soft foot to show his grace. He is our treasure in Cērai, shrine of the good path.

54. Campantar 1.75 Verikuru (Cîrkāļi)

1 My Lord who kicked fierce Death, and sent him, howling for dear life, to death, when he fell upon the boy

54. In verse 2 Campantar refers to the origin legend of the temple in Cīrkāli, According to this legend, the tower of this divine temple rose above the cosmic flood that engulfed the universe. Seated in a boat made of the primal syllable "Aum" (pranava), Śiva and Umā approached the śikhara (peak) of the temple and moored their boat there. The story accounts for the name "Tōniyappar" given to the Lord in Cīrkāli: "tōni" means "a boat." Tōnipuram "citv of the boat") is one of the twelve names of Cīrkāli. v. 7. Campantar describes the burning of Kāma, when the Love-god tried to disturb the Lord's yogic mediwho worshipped his God with flowers every day at dawn is Umā's lover who loves Venkuru's shrine set among seaside groves which the tide embraces every day, bringing with it coral and conch shell; and here he abides.

He shares his body with the Goddess; he wears the moon and snake on his matted red hair; melodiously he sings the modes, and dances as he goes on his begging rounds; my Lord reveals his gracious will. He loves Venkuru's temple now descended to earth, having once risen high and touched heaven, as it floated on the Ocean's cosmic flood which covered earth and reached the sky; and here he abides.

The formless one took form as a rough, wild hunter.
For the Goddess' sake he first fought, and then kindly gave Arjuna his desire. He loves Venkuru where the woods brim with honey, flower pollen blinds the eye, and bees sing the Nēricai mode; and here he abides.

On his matted hair he wears the konrai, vanni, erukku, mattam, kūviļam, and other flowers swarming with bees. Riding his bull, while his goblins sound the koṭukoṭṭi and kuṭamulā drums, he tunefully sings and chants the Veda.

tation. Here the incident is connected to Siva's form as Yoga-dakṣināmūrti, "the Lord who is the yogi and Teacher." In verse 11 there is a play on the two meanings of the word "vināṇam" (the peaked tower of a temple; the aerial cars of the gods). "High heaven": "vinaṇam" (the peaked tower of a temple; the aerial cars of the gods). "High heaven": "vinaṇamulaku," the great world of the gods. "Nāṇacampantaṇ, to whom the Vedas were revealed": Campantar describes himself as "naṇṇiyanūlaṇ," "he whom the texts reached." It is reasonable to take this as a reference to the revelation of Vedic learning to him as the child prodigy.

With the Ganges' stream in his hair, moon-crowned, Goddess Umā at his side, he desires Venkuru; and here he abides.

With matted hair, his body ash-smeared, the takkai drum slung in a bundle on his shoulder, he goes from house to house, begging, and steals the women's hearts with his charm. The tridentbearer shares his body with Umā, whose cool eyes are long like kayal fish. Seated on his bull, his band of spirits around him, he rides to Venkuru, the place that he loves; and here he abides.

He loves Venkuru, where, at night, waves dash against the shore, and scatter shells and oysters on the sand, which burst open and yield precious pearls, driving the darkness out.

Everywhere in this town, the sky is clouded with fragrant smoke from the holy sacrifices of brahmins who preserve the noble Vedas; and here he abides.

When the mad elephant rushed upon Umā who is slender as a creeper, he swiftly seized him and flayed his hide to dispel her fear.

This is the wise teacher who sat in the shade of the sacred banyan tree, calmly teaching the sacred Law, when the god with the sugar-cane bow came there to disturb him, and he reduced Kāma to ashes with a glance. He loves Venkuru, and here he abides.

8
This is the Lord who bore down hard with his toe on the many heads and shoulders of the evil demon, to crush him when he tried to lift Kailāsa hill, and then gave him a flashing sword. The Lord with the matted red hair adorned with beautiful blossoms of kõnkam and cerunti, konrai and kūviļam, loves the shrine of Venkuru fragrant with the golden flowers of the vēnkai; and here he abides.

Trying to measure the form of our Lord with the river in his hair, Brahmā, flying into high heaven,
and Ari, digging deep in earth,
searched in vain;
but the three-eyed god
with his beautiful body smeared with ash, even while the gods in heaven worship him, desires to take us alone in love.

He loves Venkuru's shrine, and here he abides.

He can't be found in the false doctrines of the heretic Jain and Buddhist monks.

These are his gracious acts:
For the sake of the Goddess he smashed cruel Dakşa's sacrifice; and he willingly chose the frightful disguise of the hunter who goes with his foul dogs in the forest, terrifying men with his call.

He loves Venkuru, and here he abides.

Nanacampantan, to whom the Vedas were revealed, has composed and sung these ten good verses on the Lord who loves Venkuru and abides here out of love for its temple tower that touches the sky.

The gods will bring celestial cars for those who dance, and sing this hymn in musical modes, with love for Siva, and they will reign as kings in high heaven.

Kōyil, Ārūr: Beloved Abodes

The shrine is a center in more senses than one: it is situated at the center of the sacred landscape in a palpable manner; it is, at the same time, identified with the center or navel of the universe, the spot through which passes the axis mundi linking heaven, earth, and the nether regions. In this section, beginning with the Tēvāram descriptions of the shrine as sacred center, we move to the sacred geography of the Tamil Śaivas. We have noted that this early Tamil devotional poetry is distinguished by its preoccupation with particular sacred places, with Tamil towns and landscapes. The poets' descriptions of the activities and lore associated with such sacred sites have become part of the very conception of them.

To the Nāyaṇārs, the temple or shrine $(k\bar{o}yil)$ is the place at which God has graciously chosen to manifest himself; it is his beloved $(ukanta, m\bar{e}-viya, nayanta)$ abode (itam). He is happily and graciously (initu) established $(amarnt\bar{a}r, uraiv\bar{a}r)$ there. In concrete terms, and in keeping with its origin in the Tamil cult of the king $(k\bar{o})$, the temple is a palace $(k\bar{o}yil,$ a king's house), a dwelling of monumental proportions. The conception of the temple as palace continued to be productive in South Indian temple building for centuries after the age of the Nāyaṇārs, as is obvious from the increasingly elaborate temple complexes, some of them resembling fortified cities and housing several subshrines within a series of walls

¹ For the ideas of sacred space as the "space at the center" of the universe, and of the shrine as the sanctified image of the cosmos, see Mircea Eliade, The Sacred and the Profane: The Nature of Religion, translated from the French by Willard R. Trask (New York: Harper & Row, 1959), ch. 1. For center symbolism in relation to the Tamil temple, consult Shulman, Tamil Temple Myths, ch. 2.

² See my discussion of the conception of God as king in Tamil bhakti, in Part One, Chapter 3 above. Also refer to A. Appadurai, Worship and Conflict under Colonial Rule: A South Indian Case, Cambridge South Asian Studies 27 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1981), ch. 1.

(Chidambaram, Maturai, Tiruvärūr).3 Although it is not appropriate to go into the details of the historical development of architectural style in the South Indian temple here, it is important to note the fundamental elements of the temple as it evolved in the days of the Nāyanārs, during which the Pallavas actively pioneered in the building of structural temples in stone (karrali; from kal, stone, rock; and tali, temple), and subsequent developments in the Cola and Pantiya temples, that contributed to the ideal structural image of the temples which dot the Tamil landscape today. At the core of the Siva shrine is the small, dark cell, the sanctum, called garbhagtha ("womb-house"), generally on a square plan, which houses the linga (see illus. 5). Above it rises a pyramidal superstructure crowned by a curvilinear structure of varying design. The term "vimāna," "that which is proportionally measured out," usually refers to this central shrine structure comprising the garbhagrha and its superstructure (see illus. 13). The curvilinear structure at the top is called "sikhara" (mountain peak).4 These, along with the mandapa hall in front of the entrance, formed the basic features of the fully developed Pallava structural temple of the age of the Nāyanārs and after. Among the more elaborate features of the South Indian temple are the detached mandapa (hall; Tamil mantapam), matil (Tamil "wall"), multiple prākāras (walkways, corridors), subshrines for minor deities, the gopuras (Tamil kopuram, high-towered gateways),6 and the separate shrine for the Goddess (originally called

The four principal shrines located in the Tiruvārūr complex are: the Pūnkōyil or Mūlattanam; Tyagarāja temple; Araneri; and Paravai-un-mantali. The three poets dedicated hymns to each of these temples, excepting the Tyāgarāja shrine. For a survey of the development of the Tiruvarūr temples, see Balasubrahmanyam, Early Chola Temples, pp. 192–97. A detailed study of the Gangaikondacholisvaram temple in the city of Gangaikondacolapuram may be found in Balasubrahmanyam, Middle Chola Temples, ch. 4.

⁴ For a detailed discussion of the historical development and symbolism of the parts of the Hindu temple, see Stella Kramrisch's classic study, The Hindu Temple, 2 vols. (Calcutta: University of Calcutta, 1946; reprint, Delhi: Motilal Banarsidass, 1976). On vimāna, see 1: 131–34; sikhara: 1: 181–82. Balasubrahmanyam, Early Chola Temples, provides a sketch of the component parts of a vimāna (the tenth-century Mūvarkōyil in Koṭumpāļūr).

'Great, semidetached halls became a feature of most of the important shrine complexes. Cuntarar is said to have had a vision of the sixty-two saints in the "Tevaciriyan" (Sanskrit devasraya?) hall. Cekkilār inaugurated the Periya purāṇam in the "Āyirakkāl" (Thousandpillared) hall at the temple in Chidambaram.

* It is important to note that the most striking and imposing feature of South Indian temples after A.D. 1000 (the date of the Brihadisvara temple in Tanjore) is not the central vimana but the great gate towers, the gopurus that punctuate the walls of the enclosure. Stella Kramrisch points out that "taken as a whole, the South Indian Temple... in the centuries of its greatest expansion... is a hypaethral temple, an open air sacred enclosure, with high walls, be they as many as seven, marked in the four directions by Gopurus whose height decreases towards the centre, where the main temple is marked by its position" (Kramrisch, Hindu Temple, p. 203).

INTRODUCTION

"Kāmakkōṭṭam"). In the conception and relative disposition of the various parts of the Tamil temple we see a regional reflex of the many meanings of the Hindu temple as "the body and house of God," as mountain, cave, and model of the cosmos. The cosmic symbolism is most powerfully and simply present in the basic requirement for all Tamil temples: each temple must have a body of water (a river or a tank [Sanskrit tīrtha, a sacred ford, a place of pilgrimage]), a specific local tree (Tamil talaviruk-sam) and the "mountainous" body of the shrine itself, together representing the archetypal tree, rock, and water that survived the cosmic flood.

Other than the vimāna, the Tēvāram poets do not often mention the architectural features of the temple. Yet they are very careful to distinguish among types of shrines and refer to particular temples by the appropriate technical terms: thus the temple at Mīyaccūr is called an "iļankōyil" (a temporary or newly built shrine) and the one at Kaṭantai (Peṇṇākaṭam) is called "tūnkāṇaimāṭam" (an apsidal temple, with a ga-japṛṣṭha ["elephant's back"] vimāna). Such references indicate the variety of "temples," ranging from simple, natural shrines in remote places to elaborate brick and rock-cut structures, that the Nāyaṇārs must have come across in their travels. Such names as the Little Ampalam hall (Ciṛ-ṭampalam) in Tillai no doubt refer back to the public worship halls of the Tamils, such as the maṇṛu and potiyil of Caṅkam times.

In several hymns the Tevāram poets refer to local legends and the origin myths of the shrine that is featured in the hymn. Describing the linguistic origin of place names is a common motif in the hymns. Campantar devotes an entire hymn to the folkloric etymology of the twelve names of Cīrkāli (Poem 104).

The Nāyaṇārs' conception of the sacred place or "place of pilgrimage" (pati, kṣēttiram) includes in its scope the larger settlement within which the shrine is situated. These sacred sites, as we have seen above, vary in size and prominence. From the poet's descriptions we gather that while some shrines which they visited were found in remote places, others were great urban centers of government, trade, and culture. Kanchipuram, Maturai (the Pallava and Pāṇṭiya capitals), and Tiruvārūr (Cōla cultural ⁷ On the significance of a separate shrine for the Goddess, see Shulman, Tamil Temple Myths, pp. 221-23.

⁸ Ibid., p. 47.

⁹ On the special features of the Miyaccūr and Pennākaṭam temples, see Balasubrahmanyam, Early Chola Temples, pp. 190-91. Balasubrahmanyan points out that both shrines found at Miyaccūr today (the apsidal, main temple and the Ilańkōyil shrine) must have been extant in the time of the Nāyaṇārs since Appar's hymn in Miyaccūr is dedicated to the Ilańkōyil, while Campantar sings of the deity in the main shrine.

¹⁰ David Shulman summarizes and analyzes the later Tamil puranic versions of these local legends in Tamil Temple Myths.

center), were shrine centers of the latter type. The Nāyanārs dedicated a large number of poems to these and other preeminent shrine centers. The growing popularity of the Tamil Saiva cult, and the travels and hymns of the Navanars themselves, were catalysts to the growth in the cultic and general cultural importance of shrines such as Tillai, whose names suggest connections with the wilderness. 11 To the Tamil Saivas there is magic in the very names of Siva's places. Campantar, Appar, and Cuntarar, and other Nāyanārs wrote lists or catalogues of holy places, entire hymns filled with the sonorous names of Siva's abodes. 12 The organic nature of the association of the sacred place with the presence of Siva is emphasized in alliterative formulae in which the name of the Lord (unique to a particular shrine) is coupled with the name of the place. Such names as "maraikkāturai maņālar" (the bridegroom in Maraikkātu), "malapātiyul mānikkam" (the ruby in Malapāti), and "āmāttūr annal" (the Lord in Amattur) reveal more than the Tamil sense of aesthetic delight in the sounds of the language.13

I noted in Part One that, out of the 274 shrines they visited or sang about, the Navanars dedicated the largest number of hymns to shrines in the Cola region (Colanațu), the venue of their most extensive travels. In this region, Kāli or Cīrkāli, Campantar's birthplace, commands the largest number of hymns. Campantar alone sang 67 out of the 71 patikams to Siva at this site. The Cola shrine center of Tiruvarur (see illus. 13) stands next, with 37 hymns, 23 of them by Appar. By contrast, Tillai or Puliyurc Cirrampalam (Chidambaram, the "Kōyil" of later times) receives only 11 songs. Campantar also favored Vilimilalai; he composed 15 out of the 24 hymns this site receives. Tiruvaiyāru (Aiyāru) and Itaimarutur follow, with 18 and 12 patikams each. In the Natunatu region, Appar sang 16 out of a total of 18 songs dedicated to Atikai Vīrattāṇam, the place of his conversion. Maturai, in the Pantiya kingdom, receives 11 hymns. Cuntarar alone dedicated a hymn to Ancaikkalam in the Cera region, and Campantar and Cuntarar together sang three patikams to the Sri Lankan shrines of Tirukkonamalai and Mātottam (Kētīccuram). Five different shrines in the Pallava center of Kanchipuram receive a total of [&]quot;Tillai" is the ancient name of the shrine at Chidambaram, deriving from "tillai," the sacred tree of the shrine. It is said that this sacred place was once a forest of tillai trees.

¹² Campantar II.175, Poem 71; Cuntarar VII.47, Poem 72. Prior to these poets, the Nā-yanār Aiyanikal Kāṭavarkön had produced the Kṣēttirat tiruvenpā ("the holy Venpā stanzas on the sacred places"), Tirurunai XI.

David Shulman (Tamil Temple Myths, p. 139) suggests that "the frequent alliteration of place names with the names of the local goddess" shows that the goddess is intimately connected with the soil. The alliterative connection that the saints routinely make between the names of Siva and his abodes indicates that to them, Siva, as much as the Goddess, is a deity of the soil, a god of the place. See my discussion of alliteration in the hymns, Part One, Chapter 5.

INTRODUCTION 147

17 hymns, out of which Kacci Ekampam (the Ekamranatha shrine) gets 12. Of the remaining shrines, the sites favored by all three saints receive between 4 and 9 hymns each.¹⁴

The poets' descriptions of sacred places are, by and large, formulaic, emphasizing through conventional metaphors their beauty, abundance, and prosperity. Like the itinerant bards of the Cankam tradition, the Nāvanārs exalt their patron and king by praising his land and its delights. Descriptions of lush gardens and fields alternate with cityscapes in which "tall mansions touch the clouds." The larger among Siva's sacred towns are inhabited by beautiful women and pious men who throng the streets on festival days. Centers like Campantar's native Cīrkāli are described as "walled cities" (kannatainta matir piramapuram).15 The description of Tillai, Vilimilalai, Marukal, and Cenkattankuți attest to the antiquity of these towns as brahmin settlements (brahmadeya). Appar, Cuntarar, and Campantar also connect particular villages and towns with figures in Tamil Śaiva cult history: Kālatti (Kālahasti) is the town of the huntersaint Kannappar; Appāti and Cēyñalūr are associated with Cantīcar; Tirukkatavūr with Mārkandeya; and Ānaikkā with King Koccenkanān. The three saints themselves have special connections with certain towns. As already mentioned, Campantar sang 67 hymns to Siva in Cīrkāli, his native town. Several of Appar's poems set in Atikai Vīrattānam have autobiographical references, as do Cuntarar's poems to Siva in Tiruvārūr. Orrivur, and Venneynallur.16

A large number of Tēvāram verses are constructed according to a formula in which one half of the verse is devoted to a description of the natural landscape of the sacred place; occasionally entire hymns are framed with this formula. In such "landscape" poems the agricultural landscape of the Kaveri Delta dominates, and the Kaveri or some local river figures as an important feature of the description. To some extent, the Nāyaṇārs attempt to correlate the five landscapes of Caṅkam poetry with shrines in appropriate settings: temples in hill towns such as Aṇṇāmalai, Kāļatti, Kurīālam, and Mutukunru (Vrddhācalam) become occasions for the use of kuriāci (hill) landscape conventions, and seashore towns such as Irāmēccuram, Valanculi, Cāykkāṭu (Pūmpukār), Cīrkāli, Mayilai, and Maraikkāṭu (Vedāraṇyam) are the arena for verses in the neytal (seashore) subgenre.

Appar, Cuntarar, and Campantar refer to a limited number of landscape details from the vast repertoire of the Cankam poems; the conventions used also tend to be narrower in their suggestive power.¹⁷ Through their stereotyped and diffuse allusions to flora and fauna and to classical landscape types the Tēvāram poets aim at creating a general atmosphere of lush natural beauty. In the typical description all is cool, green, and therefore beautiful (tan-, pai-, am-). The air is thick with the cloying fragrance of the jasmine (mullai) and other flowers blossoming in shady groves. Gardens overflow with honey; ripe plantains and falling coconuts muddy the rich fields full of sugar cane and rice. Riverine herons and egrets (nārai, kuruku), the peacock (mayil), the green parrot (kili), and the sweet-voiced kuvil inhabit the gardens and woods: the streams and field canals teem with every kind of fish (kayal, cel, valai, kentai). Occasionally we come across a description that has the authentic ring of actual experience, the vividness of scenes that may be encountered in the hills and fields of the Tamil countryside even today: hill tribeswomen shoot stones at parrots who come to eat the millet they are guarding; a buffalo, frightened by a falling coconut, blunders into a paddyfield. Such scenes are juxtaposed with fabulous descriptions of gems and pearls streaming from such sources as elephants, snakes, and stalks of bamboo on the hills.

¹⁴ See Appendix A for statistics on sacred places to which five or more hymns were dedicated.

¹⁵ Campantar II.176.11.

¹⁶ See Section IV below.

Because they are the beloved abodes of Siva, the temple, town, and landscape of the Tēvāram hymns become the principal arenas of devotional activity for the Tamil Saivas. It is at these sacred centers that pilgrim-devotees gather, to see and experience the Lord in his exalted manifestations, to sing his praise, to perform his ritual worship, and to celebrate his great festivals. This community of devotees who congregate at the pati includes not only young men and women, Pāśupata ascetics, pious brahmins, and dancers and singers but also gods and sages, demigods and legendary figures, even the animals of the forest.18 Drawing upon rich material from classical poetry, folklore, local legends, mythology, everyday life, and religious activity of various kinds, the poets of the Tēvāram provide valuable insights into the processes by which the lore of sacred places developed in the Tamil Saiva tradition. The enduring appeal of the hymns for the Tamil Sawas, lies, of course, in their affective dimension. One does not become a pilgrim to Siva's abodes out of a sense of obligation, but out of an active and powerful love of these places, analogous to the love that draws the Lord himself to his abodes where "he loves to dwell."

¹⁷ See my discussion of the difference between Cankam and Tēvāram poems, Part One, Chapter 3.

¹⁸ See Appar IV.21 (Poem 98).

1 The Temple

(POEMS 55-68)

55. Appar VI.309.5

The unholy town where no temple stands, the town where men do not wear the holy ash, the town which does not resound with sacred song, the town which is not resplendent with many shrines, the town where the white conch is not reverently blown, the town where festive canopies and white flags are not seen, the town where devotees do not gather flowers for the worship rite, that town is no town, it is a mere wilderness.

56. Cuntarar VII.41.3 Kaccūr Ālakkōyil

You have many temples.
Honoring them, singing their praise,
I have been cured of confusion and karma,
O master of the path that the gods do not know!
O Lord, you sat under the spreading banyan tree and taught the sacred Law at the beautiful temple, the auspicious temple, the Ālakkōyil temple in the northern part of cool Pūńkaccūr town!

57. Appar VI.247.1 Tiruvārūr

Was it the day you rose as the One praised by the universe or the day the one form became three? Was it the day you angrily quelled Death, or the day you burned Love to ashes with a glance? Was it the day you created heaven and earth or the day you took the young deer and shared your self with the beautiful Goddess? Was it before or after these deeds that you took Tiruvārūr for your shrine?

56. Ālakkōyil may be a reference to the origin of this and other shrines that are similarly named, as small shrines established under a banyan (āl-) tree. Śiva is the "master of the path that the gods do not know" ("vāṇōr ariyāneriyāṇ"). He alone can show the path of release to his devotees, and they alone can receive his grace. "Confusion": "māl"; the effect of karma.

58. Campantar I.4.11 Pukali (Cīrkāļi)

They will be kings on heaven and earth, who can sing this melodious hymn which Nāṇacampantaṇ, renowned scholar of the four Vedas and poet of good learning, has composed in praise of the blessed Lord who lives with the gentle Goddess in Pukali, exclaiming at the wonder of the Lord's desire to dwell in its celestial temple.

59. Appar V.125 Miyaccür Ilanköyil

I
There are man-made temples and natural shrines, and temples of many other kinds;
but see, here is a fine temple for Aran with the cool, matted red hair, who vanquished Death—
the new shrine at Mīyaccūr.

5
How glorious is the new shrine at holy Miyaccür for the red-hued Lord who dances holding all-devouring fire, frightening the fierce snakes that adorn him!

6
To this day, he will not leave
the new shrine at Mīyaccūr where, along with the Goddess who wears a glittering girdle, he lives, wearing the crescent moon and garlands of flowers

^{59.} Ilanköyil: A newly built temple or a bālālaya, a shrine to which the central image in a temple is moved while the temple is being renovated; a "temporary" abode.

entwined with the cool golden konrai on his red hair.

The Lord's Journeys

60. Appar IV.19.5 Tiruvārūr

The Lord who wanders through many a fair town, decked out in lovely white bones, riding his white bull, finds such delight in the ancient city of Tiruvārūr fragrant with sweet blue lilies, that he still dwells in the temple here, and will not leave.

61. Appar VI.239.10 Tiruvārūr

In Nallūr he danced for a long time, in Palaiyāru, mounted his white bull. He wandered begging in many towns, sojourned in Cērrūr for the whole world to see, then hid in the shrine at Talaiyālaṅkāṭu. He dwelt with delight in Peruvēlūr's temple, halted in Paṭṭīccuram for the night, entered Maṇarkāl, revealed himself in Cāttaṅkuṭi's shrine, and swiftly reached Tiruvārūr, where he stayed.

62. Appar VI.216 Pukka tiruttāņţakam (The Tāṇţakam Роем оf the Lord's Arrival) Kōyil (Tillai)

1
He lives in Marukal and Mayilappūr, where the evening moon shines on wide streets;
He who lives in Koṭumuṭi in Koṅku,

- 60. Appar refers to "pūnkōyil," the central shrine in the Tiruvārūr temple complex.
- 61. Siva's journey can be traced along a cluster of shrines in Tanjore district.
- 62. "Puliyūr" or "Perumparrap puliyūr" is yet another name for Tillai. Note the alliteration in "Marukal, Mayilāppūr," "Kotumuti, Konku, Kurrālam, etc." v. 2. "Our unfailing wealth": "poyyāp porul," release through Śiva.

in Kurralam and in Kutamükku, went to Kollamputür. The homeless wanderer stopped at Tarumapuram and Takkalūr for many days. Then, smeared with shining white ash and surrounded by his band of spirits, he reached the Little Ampalam in Puliyūr, and there he stayed.

2

Our man of Nanipalli, who wears the snake at his waist, rode to Nallūr, where he stopped for a while. He halted in Pācūr for half a day, and went to Paritiniyamam for twelve days. He spent seven days in Milalai on the river, ever filled with Vedic chant and the smoke of sacrifice. Our worldly pleasure, our unfailing wealth, then reached the Little Ampalam in Puliyūr, and there he stayed.

63. Appar VI.272 Valampuram

1

See the Lord with the holy forehead-eye and the fierce snake around his arm, the Lord surrounded by all the gods, even the god dark as a sapphire, who once measured the universe, and the god of the Vedas! See how once, as I followed him, worshipping and singing with other sweet-voiced women, he went to Valampuram with broad highways and fertile fields, and stayed there.

The dear Lord who revealed his own fiery form on one side and the form of Ari on the other, seemed to enter the shrine of Tāṇtōṇṛi in Ākkūr, and yet, when I, a woman of evil karma, followed him, ^{63.} The speaker in this poem is a woman in love with Siva. Appar refers to the myth of the fiery linga in verse 1, and Siva's form as Harihara (Ari-Hari; Aran-Hara), Viṣṇu-Śiva, in verse 3.

he had vanished without a trace.

My Lord who wears the sacred thread and the hide on his beautiful ash-smeared frame, the chanter of the Veda, spoke lies,
and going to Valampuram,
he stayed there.

He came to me dancing, dressed in silk, his coral body smeared with cool sandal paste, his tender feet hurting from the dance. I said: "What town are you from, my Lord?" And then I wanted to die, for he stared wildly at me and made lying speeches as he walked in circles away from me, as if he were going to another town, till he reached Valampuram,

He said, "My town is Palanam, home of many devotees, it is the ancient sacred town of Palanam, and it is Pācūr as well.

Going to good Nanipalli tonight,
I will reach Nallāru tomorrow."
He named no single town as his own.
Then the handsome ash-smeared Lord walked with a carefree stride, till he reached Valampuram with fine streets and rich fields, and there he stayed.

Sing the Shrine!

64. Campantar I.8 Ävürp Pacupatiyiccaram and there he stayed.

1 Sing the town where his lovers worship him, saying, "God of blessings, ash-smeared Lord of the hosts, he dwells in the hearts of his devotees, he wears the moon as a wreath on his head,"

64, v. 2. "The beggar": deriving attiyar from "atti," Sanskrit arthin, "suppliant."

the town of sweet-smelling groves and broad highways with palaces whose roofs touch the sky, and the ceaseless sound of hymns set to musical modes— O tongue, sing the shrine of Pacupatiyīccaram in Āvūr!

Sing the town where the Lord dwells with the Goddess, as his servants praise him, crying, "He gives us release! Age does not touch him! Dweller in Kangappūr, three-eyed god, the beggar who smashed Dakṣa's sacrifice!" Sing the town where the gardens flow with pure honey from blossom clusters swarming with bees, and the temple resounds with devotional songs—O tongue, sing the shrine of Pacupatiyīccaram in Āvūr!

65. Campantar 1.80.7 Köyil (Tillai)

They are the leaders of the world, who bow their head to the Little Ampalam shrine of the Lord whom the world praises as the destroyer of the citadels with his bow, as the god who is crowned with the rippling stream, and loves the mountain's daughter who shares his form.

66. Appar V.161 Kacci Ekampam

1
Rejoice, O heart, though you see nothing but the fruit of past deeds!
End your misery!
Wander as a devotee
of Ekampam's Lord with matted red hair adorned by flowers swarming with bees!

6
Banish darkness! Go worship with joined palms Ekampam in Kacci,

66. Kacci Ékampam: The temple of Ékampan or Ekāmranātha (colloquial Tamil "Ékāmparēcuvarar") in Kanchipuram (Kacci). v. 6. "Darkness": "irul" is āṇavamalam, the primordial impurity that clings to the soul and prevents it from knowing its true nature. "Those who have renounced the world": "paṇrilār," "those who have renounced everything (except Śwa, true devotees." Siva himself is "arumporul," "the treasure that is rare, hard to attain, invaluable." abode of the Lord with curly red hair, the rare treasure who gives the blessings of wealth, and good family, and liberating grace to those who have renounced the world.

67. Appar V.157 Nallam

When Yama's men come to seize your life,
O helpless ones, what can your kinsmen do?
Praise the feet of Nallam's Lord who rules us!
Your misery will end.

2
I'll tell you of a way to end the pain of a life wasted in useless talk—go to Nallam, home of the naked god, fire-red one who smashed Dakşa's sacrifice.

3 Sinners, in vain do you lust after women with long braids, and become their slaves!
To reach Siva, go to the Araneri shrine in holy Nallam, city of our Lord.

4
This body dear to you
is worthless the moment life departs.
Go to Nallam, sacred abode of Umā's lord.
That is our only good.

5
Before the tongue falters, and the body trembles,
Sing Nallam, home of the Lord who rides on the white bull.
Worship the Lord, keep company with his servants and shun the others.

9
Before your time on earth is spent,
worship and sing as you can,
Nallam, home of the king of brahmins who chant the Veda, Lord of Māl and Brahmā of the lotus seat.

67, v. 10. The poet puns on the name "Nallam," deriving it from "nalla," "good." "Nalla nallam," "Nallam, the place of blessing."

10

The good life is theirs, whose tongues can chant the good name of Nallam, sacred abode of the Lord who swiftly destroyed the strength of the demon whose shoulders are like hills.

68. Campantar 1.59 Tünkanaimatam

You who seek a place to perform penance to end the chain of existence, which is nothing but birth and death and insidious disease, become servants at the shade of our Lord's feet, worship Tūṅkāṇaimāṭam temple in Kaṭantai surrounded by trenches and walls, where the sweet sound of Vedic chant rises in every house!

The shifting illusions of this life are transient, perishing with death. If you want to put an end to your confusion and reach the highest world, worship Kaṭantai's Tūṅkāṇaimāṭam temple, place of healing, where devotees ceaselessly worship the Lord's feet with his glorious names.

6
Before your senses are dulled and your hearing fails, before cataracts dim the eye, before grey hair and wrinkles appear, before the advent of old age, worship Kaṭantai's Tūṅkāṇaimāṭam temple with its ancient river, abode of the Lord who shines like gold, and has the river in his matted red hair.

10 The penance which will end the wretchedness of existence

68. Kaṭantai is also known as Peṇṇākaṭam. Tūṅkāṇaimāṭam: The type of temple that has a gajapṛṣṭha vimāna, a tower shaped like an elephant's back. See Dorai Rangaswamy, Religion and Philosophy, 1: 9. v. 10. "Jains who pluck out their hair." Campantar refers to the Jain monks' practice of denuding the scalp by plucking the hairs out in handfuls. See Poem 80, v. 10.

1. THE TEMPLE 157

which is nothing but consuming hunger and disease, is to reject the lying nonsense spoken by the Jains who pluck out their hair and the Buddhist monks who wear the ochre robe, and to worship the abode of the Lord and his lovely Goddess, Kaṭantai's Tūṅkāṇaimāṭam temple which will destroy your sin.

2 The Lord's Dear Town

(POEMS 69-73)

69. Cuntarar VII.78 Ketaram

Life is an illusion,
all things end in dust.
The sea of birth is a waste,
the body is a trap made of hunger and disease.
Do good deeds without delay,
say "holy Kētāram," place of him whose immense form sent Viṣṇu with the long eyes and Brahmā of the lotus seat searching above and below!

Are not the Lord's temples sacred as places of pilgrimage? Go bathe in cool Kurukşetra, plunge in the Godāvari and Kumari, reach enlightenment in the holy hills, both north and south, say "Kētāram," sacred place where the parrot feasts on the glossy plantain fruit!

70. Campantar l.45.12 Alankāțu (Tiruvālankāțu)

Those who know these verses which Nanacampantan of Canpai town,

69, v. 1. "Pari"; "a trap, the body." The word is used in the sense of "the body" in verse 2 of this hymn. v. 6. Kuruksetra: the renowned battlefield of the Mahābhārata epic, situated in North India; a place of pilgrimage. The Godavari flows through central India. On the mythical river Kumari, see Shulman, Tamil Temple Myths, p. 54. "Holy hills": "cīparopatam" (Sanskrit Śrīparvata), Śrīśailam, South Indian counterpart of Kailāsa. In Cuntaramürīti Tevāram, the commentator A. Cōmacuntaram Ceṭṭiyār takes "talicālaikal tavamāvatu tammaip peṭil antē" to mean "temples and holy places will yield the fruit of penance only if the worshipper has taken refuge in Śiva."

70. Alankātu: "Forest of banyan trees." Banyan trees put out hanging roots that eventually grow into trees, which form a colony; they also live to a great age.

where the streets are fragrant with sandal paste, has sung through the Lord's grace, in praise of our god in lovely, cool Palaiyanūr Ālaṅkāṭu, will turn every place they visit into a place of pilgrimage.

71. Campantar II.175 TIRUVÜRKKÖVAI (THE ANTHOLOGY OF SACRED PLACES)

1 Ārūr, Tillai's Little Ampalam, Vallam, Nallam, North Kacci, Accirupākkam, good Kūrūr, Kuṭavāyil, Kuṭantai, Veṇṇi, sea-girt Kalippālai, south Kōṭi, rich Nīrūr, fertile Ninriyūr and Kunriyūr, Kurukāvaiyūr, Nāraiyūr, ancient Kāṇappērūr, and good Neyttāṇam with fine, large fields—babble these names of the moon-crested god's great abodes!

2
Annāmalai and Īnkōy hill, Mutukunru on the Muttāru and Kotunkunru, precious Kalukkunru, Kailāsa and Kōnam, Karkuti, Kālatti and Vātpōkki, love Parankunram and Paruppatam, hills of the Lord

71. In this "anthology" (kōvai) Campantar gives a topographical classification of the shrines of Śiva in the Tamil region. There is much rhyming in verse 1; verse 2 is devoted to the hill shrines of Tamilnadu and other regions. Verse 3 of this hymn lists the different types of places and place names connected with Śiva's shrines:

Eight places called "aṭṭāṇam," all the abodes of the handsome Lord, called "kā," eight more called "tuṛai," nine "kāṭu-," three "kuḷam-," five "kaḷam-," four "pāṭi-," and three "pāḷi-"—these are the beloved abodes of the spouse of the mountain's daughter with the fragrant hair. Love these, and the good Lord's town of Pācūr, for your greatest sins to be dissolved!

"Atṭāṇam": "the places of the eight heroic deeds," e.g., Atikai Viraṭṭāṇam. "Kāṭu" and "kā": "forest," e.g., Ālaṅkāṭu, Ānaikkā. "Turaī": "harbor, resting place," e.g., Āvaṭutuṭai. "Kulam": "reservoir, tank." "Kalam": "field," e.g., Netunkalam. "Pāṭī": "settlement," e.g., Āppāṭi. "Pāṭī": "site of a Jain temple or settlement," e.g., Arataipperumpāḷi. v. 4. Temples that have the suffix "-paḷlī" probably refer to sites that formerly accommodated Jain monasteries or ancient shrines built as burial mounds for heroes and kings ("paḷḷippaṭaik kōyil"). See N. Venkataramanayya, An Essay on the Origin of South Indian Temple (Madras: Methodist Publishing House, 1930), p. 2, and Nilakanta Sastri, Development of Religion, pp. 98–99.

who shares his form with the Goddess whose speech is sweet as music. Meditate day and night on these, and you will cross the ocean of suffering!

Arappalli, Akattiyāṇpalli, Kāṭṭuppalli, dwellings of the ash-smeared god who bears the river, Cirappalli, Cirāppalli, Cempoṇpalli, holy Naṇipalli, fine Makēntirappalli, town of the birthless one, Iṭaippalli, beloved abode of the river-haired Lord, and the "palli" where he gave the wheel to Māl who worshipped him—simple heart! Meditate on these!

72. Cuntarar VII.47 URTTOKAI (THE LIST OF SACRED TOWNS)

Ocean in Kāṭṭūr, Kaṭampūr's Hill, Lord of Kāṇappēr!

Sprout in Kōṭṭūr, Aluntūr's King, Bull in Kolunal,

Lord of Paṇaṅkāṭṭūr, you whom the world praises in song,

God who rides on the bull, make me sing of you without fail!

2 Lord in Kurakkuttaļi in the pālai tract of Koňku, O young man, Kurcālam's god! sky-wanderer, Chief of the gods, bridegroom in Vāymūr, O handsome Lord adorned with the conch earring, you who dance at night, holding aloft blazing fire in the burning-ground, end your devotees' fears!

4
Father in Ārūr, Aiyāru's ambrosia, King in Alappūr, Lord of Karukāvūr, whose pastures border on cloud-kissed groves,
dweller in Pērūr, Lord in Paṭṭi, giver of the birthless state, King of Pācūr, you are sung by the whole world!

73. Cuntarar VII.47.10

They belong to Siva's world, who sing in ecstasy this garland of Tamil verses ^{72.} Alliteration and rhyme seem to be the governing principles in Cuntarar's selection of towns in this "tokin" (list').

that the devotee Ūran—son of Caṭaiyan, and father of the girl Ciṅkaṭi with long dark eyes curved like the young mango, and speech sweet as honey—has sung in contemplation of the many sacred places ruled by the Father who wears the elephant hide.

3 Sacred Landscapes

(POEMS 74-84)

On the Banks of the Kaveri

74. Campantar II.246 Mantugai

Let us praise the tender feet worshipped by the gods, the feet of our Lord who dwells in Mānturai on the northern bank of the Kaveri which flows like a stream of gold, bearing the blossoms of the golden vēnkai, ñālal, cerunti, and ceņpakam, ivory and sandalwood, and the flowers of the kuruntu, curapuṇṇai, and mātavi.

We know nothing other than the spouse of the Goddess with the flowing hair and the brow curved like a sword, the god who burned with his fiery eye Kāma of the five arrows, son of basil-adorned Māl, and dwells in Mānturai on the northern bank of the Kaveri whose stream carries the sweet viļā and cāti fruit along with gems from the bamboo.

3 We know no act higher than the worship of our flawless gem whom the gods celebrate,

74. With his description of the golden flowers that float in the Kaveri's current (v. 1), Campantar offers a visual justification for "Ponni" ("the golden river"), the affectionate term by which the Tamils have traditionally referred to this river, on account of the agricultural and commercial riches it has brought them. "Turai," in the names of settlements such as "Manturai," signifies a beach or riverbed. The "ma" here refers to the mango tree. v. 2. "Basil-adorned Māl": "tulavamāl." Viṣṇu/Krishna wears the leaves of the sacred basil in his hair.

the god who begs for alms in a dead man's skull, our Lord who dwells in Mänturai on the northern bank of the Kaveri, whose stream bears clusters of fruit of the pūkam and kūntal palm from the hills where the trees are thick with honeycombs.

75. Campantar 1.5 Kīļait tiruk kāţţuppaļļi

They will put an end to pain, who become pious men versed in the sacred texts, and servants of the Lord who binds the snake around his waist, and dwells in Kāṭṭuppaḷḷi where the Kaveri crashes upon her banks, laden with flowers and pearls and fine gems and gold.

5
Let us sing the feet of the tridentbearer, the Lord who dances with ringing anklets, and loves his abode
where his loving devotees praise him, Kāṭṭuppaḷḷi on the Kaveri who rushes down in many gurgling streams, washing sandal- and aloe wood with soft sounds onto her banks.

They will put an end to pain, who become the servants of the Lord who binds the winding snake around his waist, dances to the sweet music of the hollow flute and yāl, and loves Kāṭṭuppalli where women with long, flowing hair toss aside as weeds the full-bloomed blue and red lily and lotus growing in paddyfields.

75. Kīļait tiruk kāţţuppaļļi: Lower Kāţţuppaļļi.

Our Lord with the blackened throat and body white with ash loves Kāṭṭuppaḷḷi where strong peasants transplanting rice find relief for aching wrists in breaking hard lumps of cane sugar. The devotees who worship his feet with flowers, and water, and love, will end their karma and serve the Lord.

76. Campantar I.130 Tiruvaiyāru

Tiruvaiyāru is the place where the female ape, in fright, leaps up on a branch to look for rainclouds, taking for thunder the roll of drums when women dance, going around the shrine where the Lord dwells who delivers us from fear when the five senses wander out of their cages, and cease to function,
the phlegm rises, the reason fails,
and we are afraid.

The temple of the Lord who binds
the great, hooded cobra around his waist, and, riding on his bull
along with the mountain's daughter, goes begging with the cry:
"Give me alms, O women of sweet speech!"
is Tiruvaiyāru
where whorled conches from the ocean's stormy waves, borne by the Kaveri's tide and tossed on her banks at night, yield bright pearls

76, v. 3. "The red-legged little egret": "cenkāl venkuruku." Samy, Canka ilakkiyattil pullina vilakkam, pp. 44-45, points out that, among the many species of birds called kuruku in Cankam literature and the Tēvāram, the one described as "pacunkāl venkuruku" (the venkuruku with the yellow-green legs) can only refer to the little egret (ciru vellānkuruku). He also notes that Campantar's description of this bird as having "red legs" tallies with the fact that the legs of the little egret turn a reddish color during the nesting season.

3

The temple of the god who carries a dead man's bones. the Lord of Kailasa hill and Kanapper. the trident holder. bull rider who shares his body with the Goddess. is Tiruvaiyāru where the red-legged little egret ruffles its feathers with its sharp bill to shake them dry of the water's cold and looks for prey in the fresh waters of a grove flowing with honey.

The temple of the mountain's lord, the bowman who shot the great arrow which shattered the three fortresses that oppressed great heaven. is Tiruvaiyāru, where the cuckoo sings on every hill, and the lush sugar cane slumbers in fields caressed by a soft breeze that bears the scent of flowers full of rich honey.

8

The temple of the Lord who first crushed the ten heads and mighty shoulders of the demon-king when he dared to lift Kailasa hill, and then blessed him, is Tiruvaiyāru, where the young buffalo runs, scared by a coconut falling from a shady young palm, and blunders into a bed of waterlilies. scattering the ripe grain in a paddyfield.

10

Reject the words of those worthless, wily rogues, the scantily clad, wicked Jains and the Buddhist monks! O devotees, love him, become his men! The temple in which our eight-armed, three-eyed Lord sweetly dwells is Tiruvaiyāru, where the Ponni's blossom-filled stream brings fine gems.

Our Man of the Hills

77. Campantar I.10 Annamalai

I
Karma will vanish without a trace for those who worship Aṇṇāmalai where waterfalls descend with the muffled roar of drums, hill where the Lord who is half woman,
the one who united with Umā whose breast no child has sucked, shines resplendent as a great sacred gem.

Karma will end for those who meditate on the feet, adorned by beautiful anklets, of the Lord in Aṇṇāmalai in whose woods wild bulls mate with cows, when the mango branch, let go by a male ape who's plucked its honey-sweet fruit, touches the dark raincloud, and small drops strike the mountain's rocky cliffs.

78. Campantar I.43 Karkuți

3
The Śaiva who wears the datura flower and the cool moon with sparkling stars on his crown, on which the broad river flows, is the chieftain of Karkuți's great hill where broad-chested hunters burn dark aloe wood to clear the land, raising sweet-smelling smoke.

77, v. 1. The phrase "whose breast no child has sucked" (unnāmulai) has become a standard epithet for the Goddess Umā. "Trramāmani tikala" ("shining like a great sacred gem") has been interpreted variously as referring to the landscape (gems on the mountain), the Goddess, and Siva.

78. Compare verse 8 with Kuguntokai 74, translated in Ramanujan, The Interior Landscape, p. 47.

8
Our friend who gently bore down with a toe to crush under the Great Hill the tough heads of Rāvaņa who tried to insult the Lord with a show of brute strength, is the chieftain of Karkuți's great hill, where the leafy bamboo, bent and let go by the elephant, springs back with such force as to pierce the dark clouds.

79. Campantar I.12 Mutukungu

1
Let us go to Mutukunru,
where the Muttāru's stream brings offerings of flowers, cool sandalwood, aloe, and bright saffron for the Lord.
Let us go to the abode of the fire-hued god with the crown of long matted hair, the one who devoured the poison that rose from the sea
when the gods churned it with the mountain-churn.

Let us go to high Mutukunru, in whose mountain caves the fierce lion with blazing eyes and cruel curved claws roars when he hears the thundercloud. Let us go to the place where the Saiva who meditated in the spacious shade of the great banyan tree sweetly dwells with the slender Goddess.

79. Mutukungu: Sanskrit "Vṛddhācala" ("ancient mountain"). In verse 3 Campantar uses the technical terms "pacupācavētaņai" and "vilaiyātator paricil" to describe the bondage of the soul with reference to the three malas (impurities). I have followed P. S. Somasundaram's excellent interpretation of these lines, in which he suggests that pacuvētaṇai and pācavētaṇai refer to the primordial impurities that afflict the soul, while the mala of māyā, the embodied condition, is a luminous binder (oṇṭalai) because it is a part of, and offers the possibility of, the Lord's grace. See Somasundaram, Tiruṇāṇasambandhar, pp. 117–19. Verse 10 is replete with associations with the kuṛiñci or "hill" landscape of classical Tamil poetry: Murukaṇ, god of the kuṛiñci landscape, and the Kuṛiñci musical mode, which is appropriate to this landscape.

3
Let us go to lofty Mutukunru, on whose slopes the crescent moon sails with the brilliant, thousand-rayed sun.
Let us go to the abode of our Lord whose grace alone can destroy the primordial impurities that afflict the soul, along with the luminous chain that binds us.

10
Let us go to Mutukunru,
where maidens with flowers in their dark hair sing the praise of Murukan in the sacred Kuriñci mode.
Let us go to the place of the bull-bannered Lord,
the mountain's son-in-law,
Aran whom the Jains and Buddhists do not know.

80. Campantar 1.69 Annamalai

1
The Lord whom the gods praise, and devotees worship with flowers,
the god who blessed the demons on the day he burned the three citadels, is the Lord of Aṇṇāmalai,
on whose slopes
herds of wild cows run about, terrified by the thunderclap.

2
The Lord of the gods
who wears on his crest the moon emerging from clouds,

80. Annāmalai, modern Tiruvaṇṇāmalai, is a popular pilgrimage center today. It is celebrated as the site of Śiva's manifestation as the fiery cosmic linga. Hunters' women still build tree platforms (v. 2), from which they watch the ripening millet and chase parrots and other marauding birds with cries of "Āyō!" and stones shot from slings. v. 3 Here Campantar refers to the myth of the fiery linga. "Carnal sins," "ūnattiral," can also mean simply "the body." Following V. A. Devasenapathy, P. S. Somasundaram accepts the reading "ūṇattirul": "the darkness that afflicts the soul," āṇava-mala. See Somasundaram, Tirujñānasambandhar, pp. 118–19. In verses 5 and 9 the poet alludes to gems and pearls of fabulous origin (bamboos, various animals) gathered by the hill tribes, v. 8. It is not clear whether the reference to the Lord revealing the Law (aram, dharma) to the gods is a reference to a particular myth, such as the one of his discourse to the sages under the banyan tree, or simply an elaboration of the Rāvaṇa myth. In verse 10 Campantar refers to several practices of the Jain monks that the Saivas found offensive.

and bears the ocean's poison in his throat for the good of the world, is the Lord of Aṇṇāmalai, where parrots, sweet of speech, perch with mocking cries of "Āyō!" on the tree platforms built by hunters' women who speak foul words.

3
The Lord who stood as a blaze of knowledge and unfailingly ends the carnal sins of his devotees, is the Lord of Annāmalai, whose slopes become the nightly refuge for elephant herds, and bears, and the wild boar and deer.

The Lord of the gods, the spouse of Umā who has a slender waist, the bull rider with long matted hair, the destroyer of the enemies' cities, is the Lord of Aṇṇāmalai on whose slopes the huge elephant in rut falls wearily asleep, having searched in vain for its lost mate.

The Lord of the gods, the spouse of beautiful Umā, he who once bent his bow of war to set fire to the three cities, is the Lord of Aṇṇāmalai, on whose slopes waterfalls bring large pearls and gems gathered in forest tracts by gypsy hunters with long bows.

The king of the Himalayan gods, the Lord whom devotees praise in every age of the universe, the pure one who destroys sin for those who worship him with love, dwells in the shrine of Annamalai, on whose slopes the herdsman looks for a lost buffalo whose bellow he hears, and when he plays his flute the whole herd gathers around.

7
The Highest Lord who destroys for his devotees who meditate on him, the bondage of past karma as well as the fruit of future deeds, lives in the shrine of Aṇṇāmalai, on whose ancient rocky slopes echoing with the beat of drums the evening moon rests.

8
The Lord of Annāmalai revealed the sacred Law to the gods
when they begged him to display his power, and when the demon dared to lift the hill in an arrogant show of strength, crushed his chest,
yet blessed him with his grace.

9
The Lord of the gods,
whom Tirumāl and Brahmā could not find,
so that they might end their long search,
is the Lord of Aṇṇāmalai,
on whose slopes
bands of gypsy women wander, hawking piles of pearls gathered from tall old bamboos.

10
Do not listen to the words of the mad Jain monks who carry mats, and pluck their hair, and eat their food standing.
Love and worship the spouse of Umā of the full breasts, the Lord who dwells in the shrine of Aṇṇāmalai, whose slopes shelter packs of lions.

They will attain an enduring life honored by the gods, who learn and know these ten poetic verses which Nāṇacampantaṇ of Kāli, praised by good men, has composed on the Lord of Aṇṇāmalai, on whose slopes serpents creep at night.

81. Campantar I.99 Kurrālam

I O fellow devotees!

Kurrālam, on the tall slopes of whose fragrant hill striped bees make music
in woods full of vēnkai trees, is the fair town beloved of our Lord who wears the blooming konrai wreath, and likes to bathe in sweet milk and ghee!

4
O fellow devotees!
Kurrālam, whose slopes abound in ripe mango fruit, clusters of plantain and the honeyed fruit of the jack, is the fair town beloved of our naked Lord who wears the snake and tortoise shell along with the akṣa beads, and dances holding fire.

5 O little devotees! Kurrālam, on the slopes of whose hill

81. This hymn, and the following one (on Kāļatti), are particularly rich in references to the flora and fauna considered to be typical of the hill landscape in the Tamil region. Kurrālam continues to be a popular hill resort and palce of pilgrimage, famous for its waterfall. The hill landscape of Kurrālam has been immortalized in the eighteenth-century poem Kurrālak kuravavāci, written in the Kuravaūci genre, in which the life of the Kuravar hill tribes forms an important theme. v. 1. "Make music": "yāļcey," literally, "make the music of the yāļ." v. 4. The jackfruit tree (kurumpalā) is the sacred tree at the shrine in Kurrālam, v. 6. "Kaimmā": literally, "the beast with the trunk," qualifying "vēļam," "elephant." v. 7. Blue lilies: "nīlaneytal," two kinds of dark waterliles, the Blue Nelumbo and the Nymphaea Stellata.

the monkey with her young one feasts on clusters of sweet plantain fruit is the fair town beloved of the Lord who bears the pointed trident and the bow that he bent toward the three cities.

O elders!

Kurrālam, on whose slopes gypsy women with eyes dark as the blue lily shoot gems, trying to drive away parrots who eat the ripe millet from their fields,
is the fair town beloved of my Master,
the Lord who cloaked himself in the flayed hide of the great elephant.

7
O devotees!
Kurrālam, in whose spacious groves rich in cool ponds full of blue lilies the peacock dances with his mate, is the fair town of our trident bearer, the god who quelled Death with his foot.

10
O devotees!
Kurrālam, on whose great cool slopes mating bees on the kuruntam trees sing the Cevvali mode, is the fair town beloved of the Lord whose gracious nature transcends the slander of the Buddhists who eat seated and the Jains who eat standing.

82. Campantar III.327 Kāļatti

If you ask,
"What hill does he love?"

82. Kāļatti or Kālahasti is celebrated as the site of the heroic sacrifice of the huntersaint Kannappar, referred to in verse 4 of this hymn, v. 3. "Sent forth": "vakuttu," which The answer is: Siva who showed his grace by transforming into ambrosia the poison spewed by the great ocean to torment the gods and demons loves Kāļatti's hill, where hunters' women shoot gold and gems from strong slings to chase boars and deer and parrots who come to eat the grain they guard.

If you ask,
"What hill does he love?"
The answer is: Śaṅkara of the moon-crowned matted hair, the god who skillfully burned in an instant with his ancient fiery bow the three castles of the demons, loves Kāļatti's hill, where darkness is banished by sparks rising from bamboos brushing against each other, and rays of light streaming from shining gems rooted up by stout boars.

If you ask,
"What hill does he love?"
The answer is: Śiva who sent forth Kālī who came swiftly at his command to kill Dāruka who was drunk with power,
loves Kāļatti's hill,
where black apes gather in packs to feast on the many kinds of sweet fruit they have plucked,
and frolic boisterously upon the rocks.

can mean both "created" and "appointed (for a purpose)." This verse refers to the myth of Kālī and Dāruka, not Tāraka (tārakaṇ) as the Tevaram Kalakam edition has it. v. 6. In agreement with the Tēvāram Pondicherry edition I read "par akam" ("in the world") instead of "pāratam" (the Mahābhārata). The "golden mountain" in verse 7 is Mount Meru, situtated at the center of the Hindu univese. v. 9. "Manifest Siva": "cakalacwaṇ" (sakala-sīva), "Śiva revealed in form"; the two other aspects of Śiva are unmanifest (niṣkala), and manifest-unmanifest (sakala-niṣkala), as in the luiga. See Naravana Ayyar, Origin and Early History of Śaivism, p. 359. Koccaivayam (v. 11) is one of the twelve names of Cīrkāļi.

If you ask,
"What is his hill?"
The answer is: The moon-crowned Lord, dancer in the burning-ground,
bull rider who shares his body with Umā whose shoulders are as graceful as the bamboo, belongs to Kāļatti's hill,
where the hunter who worshipped the Lord, bathing him in water from his mouth, plucked out his own flower-eye with a cruel arrow,
and thus joined the Lord's feet.

If you ask,
"What hill does he love?"
The answer is: Śiva who killed, to the beast's thundrous trumpeting,
the elephant who attacked him,
like a dark cloud looming over a hill, terrifying Lady Umā,
loves Kāļatti's hill
rich in bubbling waterfalls and streams, and bamboos that shed sparkling pearls.

If you ask,
"What hill does he love?"
The answer is: Aran who took the turbulent Ganges in his matted hair, moved by the sincere penance of Bhagiratha of worldwide fame,
loves Kāļatti's hill
where grey smoke rising from dark aloe wood which gypsies kindle and burn in wide trenches in the fields spreads over the sky.

7
If you ask,
"What hill is his abode?"
The answer is: He who devised for Māl
the strategy of piercing with the wheel

the demon Jalandhara of invincible might, dwells on Kāļatti's hill, which shines in the dark like the golden mountain, lit by rays from great bright gems emitted by winding snakes.

If you ask
"What glorious hill does he love?"
The answer is: Siva who blessed Rāvaṇa of the fire-red curls by bearing down with one lovely toe upon the great mountain, breaking the demon's strength,
loves Kāļatti's hill,
where elephants, striped tigers, and lions flee in terror when they hear hunters bearing great bows coming over the tall slopes.

If you ask,
"What hill does he love?"
The answer is: The manifest Siva who would not reveal his form to the two who opposed him, thinking, "We will quickly measure him from head to foot!"
loves Kāļatti's hill
where the vēnkai's golden blossoms grace the wedding rites in which young men of the highland tracts marry women lovely as peacocks.

If you ask,
"What hill does he love?"
The answer is: Siva who concealed his great nature from the monks who shroud themselves in robes and those who eat standing, loves Kāļatti's hill where the cow-elephant eats the sprouts of cool sandal trees in the dense woods that cover that hill, and frolics with her young.

The highest world is within easy reach for those who can sing in good Tamil modes these words that Nāṇacampantan of worldwide fame, good lord of Koccaivayam, noble town rising tall with palaces and towers, has sung on Kāļatti's hill, beloved of Śiva who dances in the burning-ground.

The Earth's Wild Places

83. Cuntarar VII.32 Kotikkulakar

I
Why do you live alone
on the seashore battered by fierce winds?
My sin is great,
that I must see you thus.
Handsome Lord at Kōṭikkulakar, who keeps you company here?

2
Is it because you once devoured the ocean's poison that you now favor Paravai, the sea?
Handsome Youth at Kōṭikkulakar,

83. Köţikkulakar: The temple at Köţikkarai (modern Point Calimere on the southern part of the peninsula), where the deity is also known as Köţikkulakar (kōţi: tip, edge, end, here denoting the tip of the land; kulakar: a handsome youth). The shrine Cuntarar visited must have been situated near a forest close to the seashore. The word "paravai" in verse 2 refers to the sea, but there is also a possible reference to Cuntarar's wife, Paravai, who was a temple dancer in Tiruvārūr. v. 5. The "Lady of the Forest" (Kāṭukilā!) is an ancient Tamil goddess. The cobra's hood (v. 6) is a conventional standard of comparison in Tamil poetry for a woman's mound of Venus (aravēr alkul). The poet plays on the meanings of "orri" (mortgaged object) and "ār" (who? stranger) in his fanciful etymologies for the names of the two towns Ortivūr and Ārūr in verse 8. This hymn and the one that follows evoke the "pālai" or "wasteland" landscape of classical Tamil poetry; in pālai poems the hero, seeking wealth, travels alone through wild landscapes. Being situated on the seashore, Kōṭikkulakar could have provided the setting for a seashore (neytal) landscape poem; the isolation of the temple and the mood of the place suggest the palai instead. For typical vignettes of the seashore landscape, see Poem 54, dedicated to Veńskuru (Cīrkāli).

bordered by lush groves, why do you live alone here, my Lord?

3
O supreme Lord who lives south of joyful Maraikkāţu where many devotees sing your praise, Handsome Youth at Kōţikkulakar, where flowering groves abound,
why do you live alone, my Lord?

This is a great wilderness resounding with the hoot of the owl, which terrifies the beautiful Goddess; cruel wicked hunters live here. Handsome Lord at Köṭikkulakar, Why have you made for yourself a temple in this place?

You who share your body
with your spouse with long, kohl-darkened eyes, Lady Ganges lives in the same frame.
Tell me why you have taken yet another companion,
the Lady of the Forest,
with bracelets on her wrists, to live with you in the temple of Kōṭikkulakar with blossoming groves?

6
Sharing your form with the Goddess whose mound of Venus is like a cobra, you dwell south of Maraikkātu fragrant with maravam trees.
Handsome Youth of Kōṭikkulakar full of kuravam groves, my Lord, you live alone with darkness for your friend.

7
Dear ambrosia who dances with the sounding warrior's ring, to the music of drum and flute,

Handsome Youth of Köţikkulakar bordered by flourishing groves, O God, why do you live alone, my Lord?

8
Did you find Orrivür a mortgaged town?
Did you leave Ārūr, thinking it a stranger's place?
O Handsome Youth crowned with the young moon,
my Lord of Kōtikkulakar,
Why do you live alone?

Though Vişnu the Strider and the god with the four heads could not measure your form, you wander as a homeless beggar. Is this the reason, O Lord, that you have made your temple on the shore where wild hunters live?

Those who know these ten verses composed by the poet of Ārūr in praise of the handsome young Lord of Kōṭikkulakar, the shrine at land's end, south of Maraikkāṭu and many other towns on earth, will surely abide in Śiva's glorious world.

84. Cuntarar VII.49 Murukanpünti

1 Why do you live with the slim girl in the great town of Murukanpunti,

84. According to the hagiographical tradition, this hymn refers to an incident in Cuntarar's life: while he was returning to Tiruvārūr bearing gold and gifts given him by the Cēra king, his friend and patron, the poet and his entourage were robbed by highwaymen in the forest near Murukaṇpūṇṭi in the hill country. When Cuntarar appealed to Śiva, the Lord appeared, drove the hunters away, and restored the goods to his devotee. v. 1. "Vaṭukar" refers to people from the areas where Telugu and Kannada are spoken today. "Wealth": hterally, "clothes" (kūṭaɪ). The idea is that these robbers will strip the innocent traveler of all his possessions. In verse 3 Campantar refers to the repugnance with which caste Hindus view the slaying of cattle. v. 7. Uttıram festival: the festival of Uttiram (Uttaram), held in the month of Paṅkuṇ, an important festival in the temple calendar. For a Caṅkam "pālai" poem with similar images, see Kuṭuntokai 274, translated by Ramanujan, The Interior Landscape, p. 81.

home of strong, wild hunters, Vatukar tribesmen with curved bows and foul words, who waylay men, who jump on travelers with fierce yells, stab them, and rob them of their wealth?

Why do you live, with no one to guard you, in the great town of Murukanpūnti fragrant with jasmine dust, home of hunters who threaten travelers with their bows, stone them, beat them up, and rob them of their goods?

3
O my Lord, having become a beggar to expiate for your sin,
why do you live in the great town of Murukaṇpūṇṭi where many tribes live like apes, home of sinners who kill and eat cattle,
fearless of blame,
men who rob and murder innocent souls every day?

Wearing the white loincloth, with ash-smeared body, you chant the Veda, delighting in the Uttiram festival at wave-washed Orrivar's shrine.

O my Lord, to fulfil what purpose, guarded by whom, and why, do you live in the great town of Murukanpūnti, home of marauding highwaymen?

4 Celebrations

(POEMS 85-99)

Rites

5. Appar V.129.1 Ițaimarutūr

Wherever I hear the sound of drums, the music of hymns, the Vedas chanted, there my heart remembers God our Master, the Lord who dwells in Itaimarutu.

16. Appar IV.31.4 Katavūr Vīrattam

Kaṭavūr Vīraṭṭam's Lord is like sweet sugar cane to those who become the madman's devotees, who rise at dawn to bathe, to gather fresh flowers, and lovingly offer them in worship, lighting lamps and burning incense for the rite.

37. Campantar III.333.1 Canpai (Cīrkāli)

The beloved abode of the handsome Lord and the fair Goddess with the beautiful hair is Canpai town, where the Himalayan gods come down to praise him, singing, "O Lord who dwells in our hearts," and perform the evening rite, worshipping with incense and lamps.

38. Campantae III.284 Kanapper

1 Devotees have no refuge other than the feet of the Lord of Kāṇappēr with groves full of fragrant flowers, where the bull elephant with his mates bathes at dawn and gathers flowers with his trunk to worship the Lord in the sacred rite.

6
My heart worships as a temple
the hearts of blameless devotees who love Kāṇappēr, home of the god crowned with the white moon, who spread out his matted hair to bear the flood that descended on him.

7
If you desire a cure for every disease that afflicts imperfect flesh, take the flower of knowledge and seek Kāṇappēr
where the wild bull elephant worships while his mate sweeps the temple yard clean with her trunk.

89. Campantar I.64.1 Pūvaņam

Holy Pūvaṇam of the south, resplendent with rich tribute paid by the Cēra, Cōla, and Pāṇṭiya, crowned kings of the realm, is the abode of the Lord who shares his body with the Goddess, and wears the crescent moon along with the sounding river, the dancing snake, and beautiful flowers on his matted hair.

90. Campantar I.82.1 Vilimilalai

The temple of the Lord who took the great golden mountain for his bow and, fitting the string with the arrow of fire, destroyed the three flying citadels, is Vilimilalai, whose citizens welcome his good devotees who come from everywhere.

91. Appar V.133.1 Katampür

The abode of the Lord with the long, bright, matted hair, on which the cool waxing moon nestles with the winding snake, is the temple in Kaṭampūr which resounds day and night with sacred song and the beat of the kinnaram drum.

92. Appar IV.20.3 Tiruvārūr

O Father, you dwell in Tiruvārūr, whose streets are resplendent with officers of the divine command, celestial nymphs with precious necklaces, initiated devotees who worship you by right, Virati ascetics with matted hair, brahmins and Śaivas, Pāśupatas and men of the Kāpālika sect!

Festivals

93. Appar V.128.1 Ițaimarutür

Let us go on Pūcam day to bathe at Iṭaimarutu, our Lord's abode, where crowds of devotees, having renounced all earthly desires, seek his feet with fresh, fragrant flowers.

94. Campantar II.192.5 Ițaimarutūr

You took for your shrine the good temple at Itaimarutu

92. Appar's description indicates that Tiruvārūr was a great and active Šaiva center in his day. The Viratis (members of the Mahāvrata cult), Pāšupatas, and Kāpālikas were followers of early Šaiva cults and sects with extreme practices in dress and ritual. "[Those] who worship you by right": "urimaiyīr roļuvār." This could refer to priests, temple dancers and singers, and others employed in ritual service at the temple, as well as to initiated members of the cult, who have earned the right to perform the pūjā ritual for the linga (civapūcaī). "Officers of the divine command": "arulip pāṭryar" appears to be a technical designation for those in charge of carrying out royal commands in connection with the temple and its activities. See the commentary in the Tēvāram Ātīṇam edition.

93, 94. Itaimarutur, or Tiruvitaimarutur, was an important Saiva center in the days of the poet-saints. Here, as in other shrines throughout the Tamil region, devotees celebrate the Pucam testival with bathing in rivers in the month of Tai (January-February). In the Mayi-where, for the blessing of the world, scholars praise you with the Vedic chant, and great seers and gods gather to bathe on the day of the Pūcam festival in the month of Tai.

95. Campantar 1.71.5 Naraiyūre Citticearam

The Lord of Cittīccaram shrine in Naraiyūr, who has the river in his hair, the poison stain on his throat, and the Veda on his tongue, goes resplendent in ceremonial dress, as his devotees and perfected sages sing and dance his widespread fame, and the sound of festival drums beaten on the streets where the temple-car is pulled spreads on every side.

96. Appar IV.50.2 Kurukkai Virațiam

For seven holy days before the festival of Aṭṭami, the Eighth Day, the Lord of Kurukkai Vīraṭṭam goes in procession in his dancing form, as Ayan and Māl and all the gods bow to him and praise him, calling him their Lord.

97. Campantar I.12.7 Mutukungam

Let us go to Mutukunram's temple, abode of the brahmin who rides the bull, the fire-hued god with the moon on his hair, before whom, on festival days, lāppūr festival hymn (Poem 99) Campantar speaks of the tradition of devout women offering feasts to Śiva's devotees at the Pūcam festival.

95, 96, 97. These verses present vignettes of Tamil temple festivals in the age of the Nayanmār. Many of the traditions described here continue to be followed in South Indian yanmār. Many of the traditions described here continue to be followed in South Indian temple festivals: the image of Siva in his various personae—as bull rider, dancer, beggar—is processed through a prescribed route around the shrine, sometimes carried in a palanquin or platform, sometimes pulled in a great temple-car (tēr); drums and women's folk and classical dances continue to play an important part in the festivities. In Poem 96, "the Eighth Day" refers to the Attami festival (from Sanskrit astamī, the eighth day of the lunar fortnight), devoted to Śiva's gaṇa attendants.

women dance in the hall of the dance to the sound of song and drum.

98. Appar IV.21 - Tiruvätirait tiruppatikam (The Hymn for Tiruvätirai Day) - Tiruvätür

He goes on his begging rounds amid the glitter of a pearl canopy and gem-encrusted golden fans. Devoted men and women follow him, along with Virati ascetics in bizarre garb, garlanded with white skulls. Such is the splendor of Ātirai day in Ārūr, our Father's town!

Folk from far and near, good men and rogues, and those who pray every day for an end to disease—our Lord of Ārūr is kinsman to all those who cry, "O my jewel, golden one, dear husband! My son!" Such is the splendor of Ātirai day in Ārūr town!

3
On every street, white flags flutter, canopies studded with great bright gems glitter, festooned with strands of priceless coral and pearl.
Such is the splendor of Ātirai day of the Primal Lord in Ārūr!

4 Gathered together, his servants sing him; now they praise his virtues, now quarrel amongst themselves,

98. The Tiruvātirai festival, commemorating Śiva's association with the lunar asterism Ātīrai in the month of Mārkali (December-January), is considered by Tamils to be the most important celebration of Śiva, along with the Night of Śiva (Mahāśivarātri). Appar's detailed description of this festival may easily be applied (with a few exceptions) to Tiruvātīrai as it is celebrated in the temple at Chidambaram (Tillai) and other major centers today. v. 5. "Cymbals": "kallavatāra", hand-cymbals or castanets? See note to Poem 9.

babbling like madmen, while the gods come every day to bow to him. Such is the splendor of Ātirai day in Ārūr, town of the Lord who is half woman!

As the blare of the moon-white conch, the parai drum's beat, and the jingle of the cymbals of dancing devotees, spread everywhere, peacocks, thinking that the rains have come, dance in delight.

Such is the splendor of Ātirai day in Ārūr town!

They sob and tremble, they stare and shout.
They frighten others, forget themselves, and go wild. Dashing their heads, they cry, "My Lord, God! Elder kinsman! O Father!" Such is the splendor of Ātirai day in Ārūr, town of the Lord!

Women with coral-red lips and those who meditate on the dear one's feet, young men and women engaged in the play of love, Indra and all the gods and the perfected seers praise him.

Such is the splendor of Ātirai day in the sole Lord's Ārūr town!

The ascetic god goes in procession, led by the immortal gods whose heads are bowed to him, while lovely celestial women with shoulders graceful as the bamboo follow behind, and ash-smeared devotees surround him, singing his praise. Such is the splendor of Ātirai day of the Lord in Ārūr!

"The days that pass without worshipping you are miserable," cry some devotees.

Others say, "Happy are the days on which we praise you."
"Let us follow you! Show us grace!" cry yet others.
Such is the splendor of Ātirai day of the Lover of Ārūr!

10
It is glorious with unceasing singing and dancing about the Lord's glory, as devotees worship and sing the praise of the god who stood revealed in the cosmic flood that engulfed the earth. Such is the splendor of Ārūr, which place every town in the world praises in song.

99. Campantar II.183 Mayilappür (Mylapore)

1 Pūmpāvai, O beautiful girl! Would you go without having seen the feasts

99. In this hymn Campantar lists the major festivals of the year at the Siva shrine, in order of their occurrence, according to the Tamil calendar. From verse 2 through verse 7 the Tamil months are listed in order: Aippaci, Kārttikai, Mārkaļi, Tai, Māci, Pankuṇi. The Kapālīccaram shrine in Mayilai (modern Mylapore) is located in the heart of the old brahmin quarter of the port city of Madras. Situated as it is in a great urban cultural center, this shrine of Siva Kapālīśvara ("the Lord who bears the skull") is a well-known and prestigious temple. Most of the festivals described in Campantar's festival calendar for Mayilai are celebrated on a grand scale at the Kapālīśvara temple. The images of the sixty-three Nā-yaṇārs are processed on the temple streets of Mylapore at the Festival of the Sixty-three in Cittirai (April). Pankuṇi Uttiram is celebrated in all Siva shrines in the Tamil region. Appar's Tiruvātīrai hymn testifies to the importance of the Tiruvātīrai festival in Mārkalī, associated with the asterism Ātīrai. The Great Purification (v. 10) is the Peruñcānti festival.

An interesting story provides the context for this hymn. When Campantar was visiting the temple in Mayilai, he was told the sad history of the maiden Pümpāvai, daughter of a wealthy and pious merchant named Civanecan. Civanecan had such great admiration for the boy-saint Campantar that he had brought up Pümpāvai with the intention of giving her in marriage to the Nāyaṇār. However, the maiden died from a snakebite. The father was inconsolable, and the entire community mourned the death of the girl. They stored Pūmpāvai's ashes and bones in an urn, and awaited a visit from Campantar. At the request of the people of Mayilai, the saint approached the urn, sang this hymn in which he reproached the girl for having lett the world without having seen the glorious festivals celebrated at Kapāliccaram shrine. At the end of the hymn, Pūmpāvai stood up, restored to life; the people of Mayilai resoiced. When Civanecan offered his daughter in marriage to Campantar, in which our Lord who loves the temple in beautiful Mayilai, whose beach is lined with fragrant punnai trees, the Lord who dwells in Kapālīccaram shrine, feeds his many devotees who love him?

2
Pūmpāvai, O beautiful girl!
Would you go without having seen the feast enjoyed by holy men at Aippaci's Ōṇam festival held at the Kapālīccaram shrine of our Lord whose sacred ash is our blessing, in great Mayilai, town of beautiful young women with sparkling, kohl-darkened eyes?

Pumpāvai, O beautiful girl!
Would you go without having seen,
on the rich streets of great Mayilai, town of beautiful young women with bracelets,
and town of our Lord in Kapālīccaram temple,
the flawless celebration of the ancient Kārttikai feast at which young girls with sandal paste on their breasts light many lamps?

Pūmpāvai, O beautiful girl!
Would you go without having seen
the Ātirai festival day
in great Mayilai town with wave-washed shores, in whose settlements live strong heroes who win battles with their sharp spears, town of our Lord who dwells in Kapālīccaram shrine surrounded by dark woods?

the saint gently declined, saying that since he had given life to Půmpāvai, he could only be a father to her. In the poem's refrain, "O beautiful girl, would you go" ("pōtiyō pimpāvāy"), "pūmpāvai" (lit., "beautiful girl") is usually taken as a reference to the maiden Půmpāvai. v. 8. "The furious demon": I read "taṇṇā varakkaṇ," "the demon who acted without delay," "the impatient, angry one." The Tevaram Pondicherry edition suggests the reading "taṇ ār": "endowed with grace"?—qualifying Śiva?

Pümpävai, O beautiful girl!
Would you go without having seen
the Taippücam festival celebrated by women who feed guests with good boiled rice and ghee,
in the great town of Mayilai, home of many beautiful women
with sparkling kohl-darkened eyes,
town of our Lord with the sacred ash,
who dwells in the Kapālīccaram shrine?

Pūmpāvai, O beautiful girl!
Would you go without having seen,
in Mayilai,
fringed with coconut palms with broad fronds,
and town of our Lord who dwells in Kapālīccaram shrine, the festival of bathing in the sea
in the month of Māci, at which women dance, singing the praise of the feet of the Lord who rides the mighty bull?

Pūmpāvai, O beautiful girl!
Would you go without having seen,
on the streets of great Mayilai, always busy with festive crowds,
the festival of Pańkuṇi Uttiram with its great sound of celebration, at which beautiful women
sing and distribute alms, at the Lord's Kapālīccaram shrine, center of many festivals?

8
Pūmpāvai, O beautiful girl!
Would you go without having seen
to your heart's content
the festival of the Eighth Day, in honor of Śiva's eighteen gaṇas, resounding with melodious hymns,
in glorious Mayilai, at the Kapālīccaram shrine of the Lord who blessed the furious demon by crushing his arms?

Pūmpāvai, O beautiful girl!
Would you go without having seen
the ceremony of the golden swing held for him who dwells in Kapālīccaram shrine, where devotees praise the feet of the Lord whom the four-headed god on the lotus seat and Nārāyaṇa himself could not fully comprehend?

10
Pūmpāvai, O beautiful girl!
Would you go without having seen,
at the Lord's Kapālīccaram temple surrounded by green groves, the festival of the Great Purification slandered by the naked Jains and the base Buddhists in voluminous robes?

They will attain release, who know these ten fine verses of praise, composed by Nāṇacampantan in pure Tamil, as a song for Pūmpāvai, the beautiful girl with the sweet, flower-adorned hair, in praise of the Lord who dwells in Kapālīccaram shrine set among fragrant groves.

5 Brahmin Ways

(POEMS 100-103)

100, Campantar 1.81.1 Kāli (Cîrkáli)

fjang

क्षें देव

The stone-walled town of Kāli is the sacred abode of the Lord who destroyed the citadels with his bow, so that virtuous brahmins, tenders of the sacred fire, benevolent chanters of the four Vedas, praised his shining golden feet.

101. Campantar l.132.9 Vilimilalai

The temple where the Lord dwells, whose beginning and end Brahmā of the lotus seat and Māl, becoming the wild goose and boar, could not find, and who revealed himself when they praised him, is Milalai, town of brahmins who arrange the grass altar according to the Vedic rite, and offer samidh sticks and butter in the sacrificial fire for the welfare of the world.

102. Campantar 1.80.1 Köyil (Tıllai)

Sin will not take hold of those who seize the feet of the Master who wears the young white moon on his hair and loves to dwell

101, 102. The hymns dedicated to Tillai are full of references to brahmins and brahmin culture, which confirms the antiquity of the brahmin settlement in that place; further confirmation is provided by the references in the hymns of Cuntarar and others to the "brahmins of Tillai" (tillan al antanar). The hymns to Vilimilalai and Itaimarutur, two other brahmin settlements provided for by Pallava and Côla rulers, also emphasize brahmin connections. Samudi sticks (Poem 101) are the fuel twigs or sticks used in the Vedic fire ritual. In Period 102, "cosmic and "kali," planetary evil, the age of strife in the cycle of in the Little Ampalam in Tillai, home of men who have conquered cosmic evil through sacred learning and the tending of the sacred fire.

103. Campantar I.6 Marukal and Cenkattankuți

Young man who lives in Marukal where the moon caresses the highways, and brahmins who chant the sacred Veda and Anga texts praise your feet every day, tell me, why do you love Kaṇapatiyīccaram where you perform your midnight dance, bearing fire, in splendid Cenkāṭṭaṅkuṭi where the streams are full of red kayal fish?

Young man who lives in Marukal, on whose wide streets smoke rises high from red fires tended by brahmins who wear the deerskin and sacred thread, tell me, why do you love to dance, with the bright hero's band ringing on your leg, at Kaṇapatiyīccaram in beautiful Ceṅkāṭṭaṅkuṭi, lush with gardens and cool fields full of cēl fish?

Young man who lives in Marukal where the flags on tall palaces touch the sky, and drumbeats and festive sounds never cease, as brahmins chant the sacred texts, tell me, why do you love to dance in the burning-ground at the Kaṇapatiyīccaram shrine in beautiful Ceṅkāṭṭaṅkuṭi with groves full of cēṭakam flowers?

103. The occasion for this hymn was Campantar's visit to the two villages of Marukal and Cenkāṭṭaṅkuṭi. The Pallava minister and Nāyaṇār Ciruttonṭar built the Kaṇapatiyic-caram shrine in Cenkāṭṭaṅkuṭi; according to the Periya purāṇam, it was at the minister's invitation that Campantar visited the Kaṇapatiyiccaram temple.

9

Young man who lives in Marukal, town of brahmins who chant the Vedas to praise you whose beginning and end four-headed Brahmā and Viṣṇu of the serpent-couch could not know, tell me, why do you love Kaṇapatiyīccaram shrine fragrant with smoke from burnt incense and aloe in beautiful Cenkāṭṭaṅkuṭi praised by singers of good Tamil hymns?

10

Lover of the mountain's daughter in Marukal where virtuous souls worship, shielding themselves from wretched Jain monks who live on a diet of bitter fruit and dried ginger served on the marutu leaf, tell me, why do you love to dance at night, clothed in the mottled hide, at Kaṇapatiyīccaram shrine in pure Ceṅkāttaṅkuti?

6 Talapurāņam: Local Legends

(POEMS 104-126)

104. Campantar I.63 PALPEYARP PATTU (THE TEN ON THE MANY NAMES [OF CIRKĂĻI]) Piramapuram (Cīrkāļi)

O Lord of Piramapuram, "Brahmā's town," where Brahmā of the lotus seat, the Grandfather, four-headed god who chants the Veda with faultless tongue, praised and worshipped you, O you who bear the bright axe and carry a skull for begging bowl, you take not alms alone from women with striped bracelets, but their beauty as well.

O Lord of Vēṇupuram, "Bamboo Forest," where the majestic sound of drums arises and spreads over the land once ruled by Indra according to the sacred Law! Wearing the moon on your matted hair with the river, you go begging at the houses of women of sweet speech and long eyes curved like kayal fish, and you steal their sleep.

105. Campantar II.184 Veņkāļu (Tiruveņkāļu)

7
The three-eyed god of Venkātu's temple and its good Mukkuļam pond

104. In this hymn, Campantar alludes to the legends associated with eleven of the twelve names of Cīrkāļi: Piramapuram, Vēņupuram, Pukali, Venkuru, Tōṇipuram, Pūntarāy, Cirapuram, Puravam, Caṇpai, Kāḷi, and Koccaivayam. Kalumalam, the twelfth name, occurs in verse 12 of the hymn. v. 2. The comparison of a woman's eyes with kayal or other fish is common in Tamil literature. The shape of the eye is supposed to resemble that of a fish; the Goddess in Maturai is "Miṇākṣī," "the Fish-eyed Goddess." In this verse I have taken the reading "peyalār caṭaī" ("matted hair with the river") against the Tēvāram Pondicherry edition's reading ("pryalārcaṭaī": "hair that lies on the nape of the neck"?).

105, 106. Venkatu and Vilimilalai are among the many shrines associated with the legend which washes karma away, blessed the elephant Airāvata who worshipped him here. The Lord who wears the akṣa beads at his waist is the one who gave Viṣṇu his wheel and destroyed the demon Jalandhara.

9

We do not consider them to be feeling human souls, whose hearts do not melt at the thought of the Lord of exalted Veṇkāṭu, place of the white elephant's penance, the god whose shining majesty could not be grasped by the one whose seat is the sweet lotus and the god who lies on the sea though they rose and plunged high and low.

106. Campantar I.132,8 Vilimilalai (Tiruvilimilalai)

The temple of the pure Lord who crushed with his toe the demon's crowned heads and shoulders when he tried to lift Kailāsa hill, trusting in his mighty arms and legs, is Milalai, whose tall temple tower arose when Māl, desiring the wheel that destroyed proud Jalandhara's frame, devoutly worshipped the Lord in this place.

The Flood

107. Campantar I.53.4 Mutukungam

Mutukungu, home of our Lord who blesses those who sing his praise of Śiwa's gift of the wheel (cakra) to Viṣṇu, who thereafter adopted it as one of his four attributes. According to the Śaiwas, Viṣṇu could kill the demon Jalandhara only after he had worshipped Śiwa at one of his shrines and obtained the wheel from him. Legend connects the name Veṇkāṭu (Sanskrit Śvetāraṇya, "White Forest") with the devotion of the white elephant Airāwata, the mount of Indra, king of gods; it is said that Śiwa released Airāwata from a sage's curse after the elephant had worshipped him at Veṇkāṭu. The Mukkuļam reservoir in Veṇkāṭu is tamed tor its miraculous powers; it is the aspiration of Śaiwa pilgrims to bathe in this "sacred water" (tirtha). The lives of the Śaiwa Siddhānta philosopher Meykaṇṭār and Paṭṇṇattār, author of hymns in the eleventh Tirumuṇai, are associated with the shrine and the reservoir.

107, 108. Murukungam ("Ancient Mountain," Sanskrit Veddhācala, contemporary is the shrine that rose above the flood, when the cold ancient sea had overrun the entire earth, destroyed the abode of the gods, and covered the land, leaving visible only four-headed Brahmā and his world.

108. Campantar I.131.9 Mutukungam

The hill of the god whose great form Brahmā of the lotus seat and Māl of the basil garland could not fathom when they rose and plunged in space as eagle and boar in search of him, is Mutukunram which rose high above
the ceaselessly roaring ocean which surged up to cover the good earth.

109. Campantar III.376 Kalumalam (Cîrkāļi)

3 Say that the abode
of the Saiva who wears the konrai wreath, along with the river and the flowers in his hair,
the god whose feet are praised by his good devotees, is Kalumalam, great as the only shrine that floated on the roaring flood that covered every sacred place and the whole earth.

If you ask, "What is the abode of the deity who became a column of fire, praised by the god of the lovely lotus and the one who lifted the great mountain?" Name good and beautiful Kalumalam, the only shrine that floated on the ocean lined with dark cliffs Tamil Vrddhācalam) is one of the many Tamil shrines whose origin is linked with its survival of a cosmic flood at the end of a cycle of cosmic time. The shrine survives because, as David Shulman points out, it is "the idealized, ordered microcosm at the center of the universe" (Shulman, Tamil Temple Myths, p. 75). The origin myth of the Tamil temple is thus a cosmogonic myth.

109. See note to Poem 54 for a brief discussion of the origin legend of the Cirkalı temple. v. 9. In his incarnation as Krishna, Visnu lifted up the mountain Govardhana and used it as an umbrella to protect his cowherd friends from torrential rain.

when the roaring cosmic flood spread over the universe, destroying all life.

The King Who Built Many Temples

110. Cuntarar VII.98 Nannilam

10
Umā's Lord who crushed the demon with his toe, so that he lay groaning, like a dark hill under Mount Kailāsa, and then blessed him, is our Lord who loves the great temple in Nannilam built by a king, glorious ruler of the Cōlas, Lord of the lands watered by the pure stream of the turbulent Kaveri.

They will enter the highest world, who know these ten verses sung by the poet of Tiruvārūr, Caṭaiyaṇ's son and father of beautiful Ciṅki, on the Lord who loves the great and beloved temple of Naṇṇilam built by King Kōcceṅkaṇāṇ whose war elephants have long, curved tusks.

111. Campantar III.335.6 Māņikuļi

Māṇikuli, where the Keṭilam's stream, fragrant with sandal, dark aloe, and fine blossoms, flows into the fields,

110. The temple at Nannilam is one of the seventy temples that, the Vaiṣṇava saint Tirumankai Âļvār tells us (Periya tirumoļi 6.6.8), were built by the early Cōla king Kōccenkaṇ or Kōccenkaṇān. All three poets of the Tēvāram celebrate this king for his temple-building activity and speak of the legend of Kōccenkaṇ being the reincarnation of a devout spider who lived in Āṇaikkā (see poems 266, 267, and 268). Campantar identifies the māṭakkōyil (raised temple) shrines at Vaikal-māṭakkōyil and Ampar (Campantar III.276 and 277) as temples built by Cenkaṇāṇ. The Cōla king is revered as one of the sixty-three Nāyaṇārs. v. 11. Cinki: Cinkaṇ, one of the two adopted daughters of Cuntarar.

111, 112. Kaṭavūr or Tirukkaṭavūr Vīraṭṭam is the site connected with Śiva's triumphant rescue of the boy Mārkaṇḍeya from Death. Māṇikuli may have acquired its own local association with the Mārkaṇḍeya legend through the process of folk etymology: the term "māṇi" means "a brahmin boy" or "student." In the refrain of 113, Campantar refers to the town by the name "Utavimānikuli."

is the place of the Lord with the throat dark as a sapphire, who kicked to death Death himself when he came to seize the life of the young boy as he worshipped his God with fresh flowers.

112. Appar IV.108.1 Kaţavūr Vīraţţam

The Supreme Lord who lives in Kaṭavūr is the one whose foot felled with a kick Death himself, dark-bodied god with terrible curved tusks, fire-red hair and coiled tongue, who had come for the boy Mārkaṇḍeya as he worshipped his God to put an end to the sorrow of ignorant life.

113. Appar IV.48.4 Äppāți

Our god in Appāţi is the Master who granted grace to Canţi when the devotee cut off the foot that his father raised to kick the linga he had fashioned, to worship with love the king of the celestial gods, the Primal Being, our Lord.

114. Campantar I.48.7 Cēyňalūr

O you who dwell in Cēyñalūr's fine temple how wonderful that you crowned with your own garland of flowers and gave sainthood to the boy who passionately cut off the foot that his father, 113, 114. Here, again, is a case of a Śaiva legend acquiring local associations with two villages. Cēyňalūr is said to be the native village of Caṇṭīcar; Appāṭi ("village of cowstalls") is often cited as the location of Caṇṭīcar's defiance of his father. In Poem 113, "devotee": "pātan koṇṭavaṇ," literally, "he who has seized the [Lord's] feet." "Liṅga": "tāparam" (Sanskrit "sthāvara"), the stationary aniconic image of Śiva. The Tēvāram Ātiṇam edition reads "tanṭiyār" for "caṇṭiyār" (Caṇṭīcar). Caṇṭīcar is also known by the name Taṇṭīcan ("the one with the stick"); according to some versions of the Caṇṭīcar story, the boy struck his father with a shepherd's staff, which immediately turned into an axe. In Poem 114, "Garland of flowers": Śiva's garland or wreath of koṇṭai flowers.

angry with the child for offering milk to his God, had raised to kick at his worship!

Rāmāyana Sites

115. Campantar II.179.2 Pullirukkuvēļūr

The abode of the brahmin who toils as a wandering beggar, bearing the Goddess in half his frame, and the other woman on his matted hair, is Pullirukkuvēļūr, place of the truthful one who flew up to overpower the liar, Rāvaṇa, and died fighting with him.

Noigosono.

116. Campantar III.268.2 Irāmēccuram (Rāma's temple to Śiva)

They will be rid of karma, who have loving thoughts for Irāmēccuram, temple built by the hero to atone for the sin of severing with his bow the ten great flower-crowned heads of southern Laṅkā's king who stole his queen.

Rainallerana

115, 116. These verses allude to place legends connected with characters in the epic Rāmāyaṇa. "The truthful one" of 115 is Jaṭāyu, the great vulture who attacked the demon Ravana when the latter was speeding away in his flying chariot with Rama's wife Sītā. At the end of a long battle, Jatavu was mortally wounded, but he lived to tell Rama about his encounter with the demon. The entire hymn II.179 is devoted to praise of latavu and his brother Sampati, extolling the devout penance with which they propitiated Siva at Pullirukkuyêlûr; in this verse Campantar expounds on the folk etymology of the name of this town, in which the word "pul" ("bird") is supposed to refer to the renowned bird-heroes of the Ramayana. Pullirukkuvēlūr, also known as Vēlūr or Vaittīšvaran Kôyil, is connected with the Tarumapuram Atinam, an important center of Tamil Saiva religious authority. Poem 116 again refers to the abduction of Sītā by Rāvana. The origin legend of the shrine at Irameccuram ("Râma's temple to Siva") narrated here and in 117 is an ancient one. Though the demon Rāvana deserved to be killed, Rāma incurred sin by killing him, since Rāvaņa was also a learned brahmin and a pious devotee of Siva. Situated on a narrow strip of land in the part of the South Indian peninsula facing northern Sri Lanka, Irâmēccuram (Rameswaram) is one of the four major Hindu pilgrimage sites representing the sacred geographical boundaries of India in the cardinal directions.

117. Appar IV.61 Irâmēccuram

1 With deep love, think every day of holy Irāmēccuram, abode of the brilliant god, temple built with devotion and consecrated with ritual offerings of fragrant flowers by pious Māl when he had killed the sinful demons.

Though I ceaselessly have on my tongue the holy name of Irāmēccuram, temple built on the causeway by Māl when he had bridged the ocean with great rocks, and achieved his goal, swayed by five who dwell in my flesh, I whirl about with an impure mind.

4
O heart, if you seek a good end, go worship at holy Irāmēccuram, be saved at the temple built with love by beautiful Māl with the mighty discus when he had killed the evil demons with shoulders like hills.

6
Simple heart, go to my red-haired Father in holy Irāmēccuram, temple built by Māl when he had defeated in battle and annihilated the demons who had fought with him, arrogant in their might.

10 They will abide with the Lord, who can see with their eyes the temple in holy Irāmēccuram, made by red-eyed Māl, when he had killed the cruel, heartless demons who engaged in deadly battle with the god, ignorant of the pious life.

117. "Māl" here refers to Viṣṇu in his incarnation as Rāma. In verse 3 Appar mentions the bridge of rocks that Rāma, aided by his army of monkeys, built across the ocean, linking the Indian peninsula with Sri Lanka. Following the Śaiva Purāṇas, which speak of Rāma's erection of a temple on the causeway, I have taken "tiṭal" (lit., "island") as referring to the causeway itself. v. 10. "Red-eyed (cenkan) is an epithet frequently used to describe Māl (Visnu).

118. Appar VI.268.8 Pullirukkuvēļūr (Vaittisvaran Kôyil)

The Lord whom the gods praise with a thousand names, the one who gives the unattainable treasure to his faithful devotees, he who is all mantras and tantras and healing potions, and through his grace cures our incurable disease, the warrior who took up his mighty bow to burn the three cities, the Lord in Pullirukkuvēļūr—I, who have failed to sing his praise, have wasted my life!

119. Appar IV.65.9 Cäykkäţu

It was Cāykkāṭu's Lord who gave Viṣṇu his wheel when he worshipped him reverently with a thousand fragrant flowers, and, lacking a single blossom, offered his own lotus eye in its place.

118. The village of Pullirukkuvėļūr, near Māyavaram, is today famous as "Vaittīśvaran Köyil," "Temple of the Lord who is our Physician." People come to the temple here from all over Tamilnadu in the belief that Siva Vaittīśvaran will cure even incurable diseases. Appar's verse celebrates the Lord as the healer in Pullirukkuvēļūr. In the vision of the saints, Siva cures the "incurable disease" ("tīrā nōy") of existence itself. Though the collocation "mantras and tantras" usually denote the Vedic and Āgamic texts, in this hymn, along with "maruntu" ("medicine," "healing draught"), they can be taken to connote other strategies used for curing disease in the Tamil region: the mantras and tantric rites employed by healers and priests of local goddesses and gods in curing illness of various kinds. "The unattainable treasure": "enjum vārāta celvam," release.

119, 120. The motif of the "lesser" gods (in the Saiva view), especially Visnu and Indra, becoming devout worshippers of Siva figures in the place legends of many Tamil shrines. In these stories, Siva tests the devotion of the worshipper by making one of the thousand lotuses required for the rite disappear; the devotee offers his own eye in place of the flower; Siva rewards him with his grace and grants him whatever he desires. In Poem 120, "you took his eye": "han calarippate," literally, "you made him dig out his eye."

120. Appar IV.100.4 Kacci Ekampam

O great Kāñci's Lord who wears the crescent moon on long matted hair!
O god with the poison-stained throat!
To subdue Māl's pride you took his eye in place of the missing flower when he worshipped you every day with single-minded devotion, offering a garland of a thousand lotuses.

The Goddess in Kanchipuram

121. Cuntarar VII.61.10 Kacci Ekampam

When the Goddess Umā herself honored the Lord with worship, when she who loved him and treasured him in her heart began the sacred rite, seeing her devotion, he caused the river to flood, frightening her, so that she ran and embraced him—and then he revealed himself.

Surely it is to see
Kampan the Trickster, our Lord, that I am endowed with eyes!

The Devout Rat of Maraikkāţu

122. Appar IV.49.8 Kurukkai Virațiam

When the grey rat in rich Maraikkatu, pushing with his snout,

121. The ancient legend of the union between Siva and Umā-Pārvatī at Kanchipuram and its connection with the name of the Ēkampam shrine or the "Ekāmranātha" temple, forms the theme of the whole of VII.61. Verse 10, translated here, paints a dramatic picture of the principal "event" in the myth. In one of the many local versions of her penance for obtaining Siva as her husband, the maiden Umā performed the ritual worship of a sand-linga on the banks of the river Kampā (linked with the name "Ēkampam"). Pleased, yet desirous of testing the strength of the Goddess's love, Siva caused the river to flood, threatening to sweep the linga away. The frightened Umā at once embraced the linga, shielding it with her breasts. Siva, Ēkampan, or Kampan ("the Lord of the Pillar"; related to Vedic "Skambha"?) emerged from the linga, and God and the Goddess were united. "Kallak Kampan" ("Kampan the Trickster") is one of the three forms of the Lord in the Ēkampam shrine.

122. This is one of the many local legends in which the "lower" animals are rewarded by coaxed the flame to keep the lamp in the shrine burning bright, the Lord of Kurukkai Vīraṭṭam gave him sole dominion over earth and sky and the far world of heaven.

Tontaiman and the Jasmine Creeper

123. VII.69.10 Vațatirumullaivăyil

O God who once bound with a mullai creeper the elephant of King Toṇṭaimāṇ of matchless fame, and then revealed yourself, granting him everlasting bliss,
Lord of holy Mullaivāyil, ever praised by good men, god who rides on the white bull, object of every art, free me from suffering,
O Lord of Souls, Supreme light!

Brahmā Worships Śiva

124. Appar IV.49.1 Kurukkai Virattam

The Lord of the Vīraṭṭam shrine in Kurukkai where bees hum, flitting from flower to flower, enlightened the chanter of the Veda, Brahmā, who worshipped his feet at the time of the first creation.

Showing himself as a blaze of light, the Lord stands beyond words.

Siva for extraordinary acts of devotion. Though the song is dedicated to Siva at Kurukkai, the incident relates to Maraikkātu.

124. Kurukkai Virattam is the site where Siva cut off one of the heads of Brahma.

^{123.} Here Cuntarar gives us the tradition surrounding the origin of the shrine at Mullaiväyil ("Place of the Jasmine Creeper") in Tontainātu. When a Tontainān chief was out hunting, a jasmine (mullai) creeper wound itself around the legs of his elephant. When the king tried to cut the creeper away with his sword, the sword struck a linga of Siva hidden under the mullai vine. The linga began to bleed, and the king was distressed. His fear was allayed by Siva, who revealed himself and told him to build a temple on that spot. "Everlasting bliss": "ellasyil inpam," "bliss that has no bounds in space and time," "release."

Indra's Curse

125. Campantar I.101.7 Kannārköyil

They say that "Kaṇṇārkōyil," "Temple of the eyes," where young girls gather to worship every day, is the shrine where the Lord dispelled the sage's curse that Indra had once earned and graciously gave him a thousand eyes.

The Woman of Palaiyanur

126. Campantar I.45.1 Palaiyanur Ālankāțu

Our Lord in Palaiyanūr Ālankāṭu, home of men who feared for their honor when they heard of the woman who took her lover's life by foul means, is the god who comes to me in my dreams and makes me praise him.

He is the one who enters my heart to awaken his remembrance when I have been unaware.

125. Local tradition connects the shrine of Kaṇṇārkōyil with the legend of Indra and Ahalyā narrated in the Rāmāyaṇa. When the sage Gautama found out that Indra had committed adultery with his wife Ahalyā he cursed the king of gods, saying that he would thenceforth bear a thousand vaginas on his body as a reminder of his crime. When Indra worshipped Śiva at Kaṇṇārkōyil, the god helped Indra by changing the thousand vaginas into eyes (kaṇ).

126. This verse provides evidence for the antiquity of the story of Nīli, the goddess/demoness, and her many associations with the shrine at Ālaṅkāṭu. In its simplest form, the legend focuses on the injustice done to a woman who was murdered by her husband, her revenge on her husband in a subsequent birth, and the voluntary suicide of the Vellala community of Palaiyaṇūr upon realizing their responsibility for these deaths. See Shulman, Tamil Temple Myths, pp. 195–97. The Tamil Saiva tradition associates Palaiyaṇūr Ālankāṭu with another demoness/woman/saint, the early Nāyaṇār Kāraikkāl Ammaiyar, as also with Śiva's dance contest with the goddess Kālī.

Ațiyar: The Ways of Love

The emotional core of Tamil Śaiva bhakti—the relationship of love between Śiva and his devotees, and the many ways in which this love is felt and expressed—forms the major theme of the poems presented in this section. We begin with hymns in which the saints focus on Śiva as the beloved Lord, invoking him in emotionally charged images and metaphors. In such verses, the Lord is the saint's master, bridegroom, friend, father, mother, and kinsman; he is all the things that the poet-devotee loves and treasures in the world. Pan-Indian images mingle with characteristically Tamil ones. To the Nāyaṇārs, as to devotional poets all over India, the Lord is a flame, a blaze of light. Appar calls Śiva his "eye" (kaṇ), and all three poets speak of the Lord being sweeter than sugar cane (karumpu) or honey (tēṇ), these being popular metaphors for the beloved in Tamil culture.

The poets devote entire hymns to the virtues and transformative powers of the Lord's emblems. Chanting "namaccivāya," the pañcākṣara mantra or the five sacred syllables in which Śiva's name is invoked, and contact with the sacred ash are extolled as sure paths to the Lord's grace. Appar wishes to be branded with the trident and the bull, Śiva's insignia. The greatest affective value is attached to the Lord's feet, supreme symbol of his power and grace; these beautiful, flower-soft feet are the devotee's ultimate refuge, and his highest aim is to rest in their "cool shade."

In the world view common to the major religious traditions of India, karma (action, deed; Tamil vinai) implies fruit or result that must be "suffered" by the doer in embodied form. Out of the network of deeds done by each soul in relation to it and others, a chain of embodiments or births results. One who wishes to attain release (moksa, Tamil vītu) from this chain of karma must make determined efforts along well-defined "paths" to achieve this goal. The Saiva Siddhanta and other theistic philosophical systems developed complex doctrines regarding the nature of souls. karmic bondage, and final release, and the relationship between these and God. The Tevaram saints do not often use terms such as pacu, pacam, and malam, which are commonplace in the works of Tirumular and Manikkaväcakar and in post-Tēvāram Tamil Śaiva devotional literature in general. At the same time, it is clear that the Tamil Saiva idea of the process of karma (for which the saints use the Tamil vinai) and bondage through primordial impurities (malam) that afflict the soul (pacu) is central to the poets' religion.3 Appar, Campantar, and Cuntarar are deeply concerned about the sorrow of existence and the binding nature of karma, and they see devotion to Siva as the basis for all "paths" to release from bondage. Their conception of release is typical of the salvific vision of the bhakti as opposed to the non-bhakti traditions in Hinduism. The Tevaram hymns (and the signature verses in particular) abound in popular pictures of the rewards of turning toward Siva; here we are told that through unfailing and total devotion the devotee will attain a variety of "states," ranging from earthly sovereignty to the privilege of dwelling in the world (Sanskrit loka; Tamil ulaku) of the gods or heaven (vānulaku), or Siva's world.4 Such pictures are certainly intrinsic to the saints' view of the process of "release." Nevertheless, it is clear that to Appar, Campantar, and Cuntarar, the very act of reaching (cer-) Siva's feet is both the means and the ultimate end. In that act of taking refuge (caran atai-) devotees are "released"; they have crossed the ocean of sorrows (tuyar, itar), for the Lord, through his grace (arul), puts an end to karma (vinai tīr-).

² See the comment above on the symbolism of feet in Indian civilization in the introduction to Section II of Part Two.

¹ Śiva's association with fire and light symbolism takes many forms in the Tamil tradition. The god's manifestation as the fiery cosmic linga is located in the shrine of Annāmalai; here Śiva dwells in his elemental form of fire. The most important festival at this shrine is the festival of lights (Tamil tīpam, Sanskrit dīpa) in the month of Kārttikai. In his Tiruvaruṭpā, the nineteenth-century mystical poet Irāmaliṅka Aṭikaļ further developed the theology of Śiva as light. See Zvelebil, Smile of Murugan, p. 113.

The verses in which the Nāyaṇārs speak directly of their states of mind in relation to the Lord have much in common with the poetry of mystical love in many religious traditions. The Tēvāram poets sing of the many stances and moods of the bhakta, which range from the mood of unrephy of Campantar in Tirujnānasambandhar, esp. ch. 3, 4.

See Sivaraman. Śaivism, for a detailed study of the Śaiva Siddhānta view of karma, bondage, and liberation. P. S. Somasundaram discusses in detail the theology and philosophy of Campanage in Timing a combined by a company of Campanage in Timing a combined by a company of the company of the

The concept of souls "dwelling," in accordance with their merit, for limited periods of time in a hierarchy of "worlds" (loka)—such as the worlds of the gods and the ancestors—is found in the early Upanişads. The Saiva and Vaiṣṇava sects in South India have their own versions of such worlds derived from pan-Indian and local folklore mixed with the ideas developed in the "classical" texts. At the top of the hierarchy, roughly analogous to "highest heaven," are Kailāsa and Vaikuṇtha, the celestial "abodes," respectively, of Siva and Viṣṇu. Also included in this popular mythology of karma and reward is the notion of the hells naraka supervised by Yama or Dharmarāja, god of Death and retribution.

INTRODUCTION 207

quited love and the powerful longing for union with the beloved, to absolute faith and joy in the certainty of grace. Such introspective passages are rare in Campantar's poetry; Appar gives subtle and powerful expression to the emotional aspect of Tamil Saiva religion; and Cuntarar's poems exhibit the most dramatic swings of mood. Taken as a body, the work of each poet reveals a distinctive persona and a personal religion. Thus we see that Appar often speaks in a mood of self-abasement, presumably because of his sense of guilt over his past as a Jain monk. In sharp contrast to Appar, Cuntarar, who claims that he was forcibly possessed by Siva and blessed with the name of the "Rude Devotee," is indeed rude, in every sense of the term-he mocks and reproaches Siva, and goes from expressions of abject slavery to familiar entreaty to highhanded demands. Poems referring to specific incidents in the lives of the saints have been placed in Section IV, but a number of selections representative of each poet's unique religious sensibility are included in this section. It should be noted that these poems have not been arranged to reflect a "spiritual biography" in chronological order. Anyone familiar with mystical poetry will recognize here the universal patterns of the spirit's alternation between pain and grace in its stormy relationship with God.

The variety of rhetorical frameworks employed in the Tēvāram makes for variations in the tone of the hymns. The hymns that are directly addressed to Śiva and those that provide a description in the third person are in the tradition of stotra praise-poems, while the communal aspect of Tamil Śaiva bhakti is clearly brought out in those poems in which the saints address their words to their fellow devotees. No audience is specified for many poems cast in the first person, but there are also verses in which the poet—or the "I" of the poem—addresses his own heart (maṇam, neñcu) and emphasizes the introspective nature of the verse. Any or all of these formats may be found in a given hymn. There are also a few poems in which the speaker in the poem is the lovelorn heroine of the akam tradition. Poems of this type are particularly interesting, for both the rhetorical effect created by the assumption of a persona and the fact that images and metaphors drawn from explicitly erotic love are rare in the Tēvāram.

The strong strain of asceticism in Tamil Śaiva religion—fully developed in the Siddhānta philosophy and the cittar cult—is represented in hymns in which the body and the senses are portrayed as obstacles to the devotee in his or her efforts to realize the Lord's grace. Images of revulsion for the body, and for decay and death, dominate some poems. In others the saints use the theme of the imminence of death (Yama and his men) and the tortures of Yama's hells as a compelling reason for focusing one's senses and thoughts on Śiva. Such poems are counterbalanced by hymns in which—in keeping with the bhakti emphasis on the use of the senses in the apprehension of the divine—the senses and the body are seen as indispensable instruments for acts of devotion.

Although the poetry of the inner life unambiguously conveys the essence of the Nayanars' devotion, no picture of Tamil Saiva bhakti is complete without a sampling of hymns in which the saints define and describe the external modes of devotion and the attitudes upon which these are based.5 The three saints lovingly invoke the details of ritual worship, Devotees and others prepare themselves for worship; they gather flowers and bathe the linga with the "five gifts of the cow" (anaintu), light lamps at the shrine, and make offerings of incense, unquents, chant, and song, In such descriptions the poets are careful to emphasize the criterion of true bhakti: that worship alone is true that expresses genuine devotional emotion; hence the subgenre of hymns in which the true Tamil Saiva devotee is distinguished from these who masquerade as devotees. It is also for true devotion in the ritual idiom that saints such as Kannappar and Cantīcar are repeatedly celebrated in the Tēvāram. Seen in this context, it is clear that the often-quoted verse "Why bathe in the Ganges?" ("kankaiy āţilen") (Poem 207) is not a rejection of ritual acts but an affirmation of the requirement that all acts of worship arise out of true love for God. In the final group of poems in this section, the poets extol the act of singing as the quintessential expression of love of the Lord.

See my discussion of ritual and love in Tamil Saiva bhakti in Part One, Chapter 3.

1. Cuntarar, Appar, and Campantar. Còla bronze; Pangal temple.

2. Campantar with the cup of divine wisdom. Côla bronze; Nallambal temple.

3. Appar, cradling his hoe in his arms. Cōla bronze; Tırucchengodu temple.

4. Cuntarar and his wite, Paravai Năcciyâr, Côla bronze; Nallûr temple.

5. Śiva: Linga. Stone, in sanctum; Nārttamalai.

6. Šiva with the Goddess. Cola bronze; Tiruvēļvikkuņi temple.

7. Šiva as Ardhanārīšvara, the Lord who is half woman. Cola bronze; Tıruvenkāţu temple.

8. Sıva Natarāja, Lord of the Dance. Cōla wall relief; Gangaikondacolapuram.

9. Siva Bhikṣāṭana, the Lord as beggar. Còla bronze; Tiruvaiyāṭu temple.

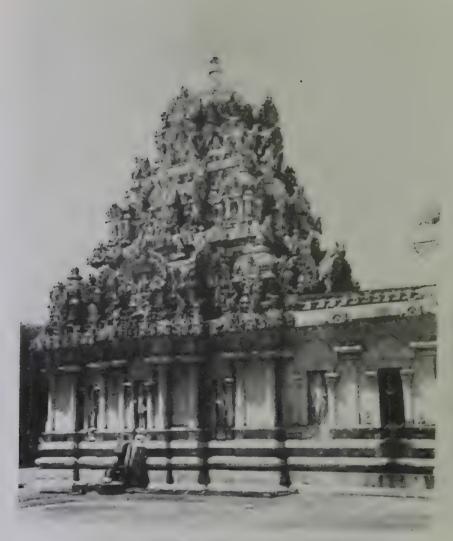

10. Śwa manifesting himself in the cosmic linga. Cóla wall relief; Punjai temple.

11. Rāvaņa tries to lift Kailāsa and is crushed by Śiva; Rāvaņānugraha-mūrti. Cōla wall relief; Tirunelvēli temple.

12. Siva saves the boy Markandeya from Death in the central panel; Kâla-saṃhāra-mūrti. On the left is Death coming with his noose; on the right is the boy embracing the linga. Côla wall relief; Thanjavur, Brihadisvara temple.

13. The central shrine structure (vimāna) in the main temple at Tiruvārūr. North façade.

14. Naņacampanta Ōtuvār in the courtyard of Cīrkāļi temple.

15. Verses from the Tēvāram (Appar V. 196) inscribed on the wall of Tiruvānmiyūr temple, to which hymn V. 196 is dedicated.

1 The Lord Is Sweet

He dwells in heaven and in the great Veda; he lives on sea-girt earth and in Tirumal's heart. He is in the sweet tunes of love and in the hearts of his lovers.

My Lord who has the poison stain on his throat is in the eye, heart, and head of this old dog, his slave.

128. Appar V.204.1

The vinā's pure sound, the light of the evening moon, a gentle breeze, springtime sun, a pool humming with bees—like these is the shade at my Lord, my Father's feet.

water of Bride Red Regione

129. Appar V.135.1 Innampar

I hold none dearer to me than myself; yet within my self there is one dear to me— Innampar's Lord who is the breath of life, which enters and leaves me, and abides within.

130. Appar IV.70.4 Nanipalli

As song in the mode, juice in the fruit, sight in the eye, elixir for the heart's desire,

127. In the expression "this old dog, his slave" "palanavativen". Appar combines palaratiyār, a term used for servants who by hereditary right serve the master in a tamily and nāyaṭŋēŋ, "I, a dog, my master's humble servant."

thought in the mind, as all the seven worlds, the Lord of Nanipalli ends the karma of all who seek him.

131. Appar V.177,2 Kurankatutugai

My pearl, my precious gem, glittering branch of coral, bright flame—when I call him, "My Father who lives in Kurankāṭuturai with blossoming groves," my tongue tastes an incredible sweetness.

132. Appar V.131.2 Yenniyür

When I think of the skullbearer who wears a wreath of flowers in his hair, the Lord with the white moon who likes to live in Venni's ancient city, a flood of ambrosia wells up in my tongue.

133. Appar V.128 Ițaimarutür

My heart melts with love for the handsome god who bears the river in his hair, ltaimarutu's Lord who rides on the bull, the youth who ends the karma of those who sing his praise.

10 Sweeter than sweet fruit, raw cane sugar, lovely women with fresh flowers in their hair, sweeter than sole dominion over vast lands, is Itaimarutu's Lord to those who reach him. 134. Appar V.207 Marakkirpané yannun tiruk kuruntokai (The Kuruntokai Poem Entitled "How Should I Forgat Him?")

Honey, milk, moon, and sun, youth crowned with the celestial white moon, wisdom incarnate as the fire that consumed the god of spring—How should I forget him?

6
Sugar, sweet syrup of sugar cane, bright one, brilliant as a lightning flash, golden one, my Lord who glitters like a hill of gems—
How should I forget him?

7
Sugar cane, lump of sweet sugar candy, bee in the fragrant flower,
light that dwells in the light of every flame,
our Lord who loves flower buds gathered at dawn—
How should I forget him?

Metaphors

135. Appar IV.76

2
Plow the field with true faith.
Sow the seed of love, water it with patience, and pull out falsehood's weeds.
Look into yourself, build a fence with virtue.
Stand rooted in the right path—
Harvest the state of Siva!

134, v. 5. "The god of spring" (vēṇilāṇ), Kāma, god of Love, who was burned by fire from Śiva's third eye.

135, v. 2. "Patience": "porai," also tolerance, nonviolence. "Look into yourself": "tammaiyum / tammaiyul nökkik kantu"; "know the true nature of the self through yogic meditation." v. 4. Here Appar speaks of the ritual of pūjā to the linga as the Agamic equivalent of the Vedic sacrifice. For the idea of the body as the "mobile temple" (natāmatāk koyil), see Tirumūlar, Tirumantiram 1821 (Kaļakam edition).

The body is the temple, the loving heart is the devotee. Truthfulness will do for ritual purity, the jewel of the mind is the adorned linga. With love as milk and ghee generously mixed with water, with hymns as oblation, let us offer worship as sacrifice to the Lord.

136. Appar V.204.10

Like fire in kindling wood, like rich ghee in milk, he dwells hidden within you. Plant your love as churning stick, churn hard with the rope of feeling. The Lord will come forth, bright as a great gem.

137. Appar V.135.4 Innampar

Innampar's Lord moves my mind to focus on him who makes love flow from his servants who call out with joy like peacocks
at the sight of rain.

138. Campantar II.142.4 Aiyāņu (Tiruvaiyāņu)

Aiyāru's Lord is the kind god who delights in listening when women with melodious voices,

138. Vannam is a genre of melodic composition with complex rhythmic dimensions. "Hymns": "vāymoļi"; literally, "word-of-mouth." Originally signifying the Veda, the sacred Word, the term is used to denote sacred hymns in the names of such works as the Tirus aymoli, a collection of hymns by the Tamil Vaisnava saint Nammāļvār. See Ramanujan, Hymns, pp. x-xi. I have taken the word "vali" to mean "power, glory." The hypothetical reading "vari," signifying "varippatal," yet another type of song, would make better sense in this context.

coral-red lips, countless virtues, and eyes sharper than spears, sing his glory in vannam songs and hymns of praise.

Remembrance

139. Campantar III.279.1 Karukkuți

See my Lord who dances with blazing fire in Karukkuṭi, place worshipped by the entire earth with the sounding sea, the pure one who haunts me day and night, in sleep and in waking, and in bright remembrance of him!

140. Appar IV.57.1 Avatuturai

Youth who shines as a ruby, as a cluster of emeralds!
Being who enters my heart, stirring memory!
Come to me in my sleep, be my friend, give me refuge in your grace, O dweller in Avatuturai!

Our Kinsman

141. Appar VI.309.1

You are my father and mother, you are my Lord.
You are loving uncle and aunt to me.
You are lovely women and rich treasure,
my only family, friends, and home.
You give me the pleasures of this world and the other, and save me in the end.
O sole friend who moves my heart to leave this world,
O my gold and precious gems and pearls!
You are my God, my treasure who rides the bull!

142. Appar IV.95.1 Patirippuliyür

The Lord who graciously made himself three to create the universe has chosen to dwell within my heart as the mother who gave me birth, as my own father, as those born with me. The beloved of the Himalayan gods lives in holy Pātirippuliyūr as unseen friend to all of us, his loving devotees.

143, Appat IV.15 PAVANĀCAT TIRUPPATIKAM (THE SACRED HYMN THAT DESTROYS SIN)

The ancient holy shrine that the bondless reach, the coral rooted in Pācūr, our glowing fruit in the Little Ampalam, the sacred form that none may touch, Verriyūr's spreading flame, king of gods, our supreme Lord in wave-washed Orriyūr,

I have placed him within my heart.

The Lord who is the Goddess in Āṇaikkā, our Father who dwells in Ārūr, the lump of sugar candy in Kāṇappēr town, sugar cane that sprouts in Kāṇūr, Vāymūr's rare conch whom the gods of heaven praise, the wild elephant of great Kailāsa, I shall not forget the moon, the flame.

3
The sun who wears the cool moon as a wreath, the cure for the world-illusion,

143. Much of the affective impact of this hymn is related to the bonds of alliteration and assonance established between Siva's epithets and the names of his abodes: e.g., in verse 1, line 1: "paṭraṭṭāṭ cēr paṭampatiyaip pācūr nilāya pavaļattai." v. 1. "The ancient holy shrine": "paṭam pati." C.K.S. Mutaliyar notes that this is a traditional name given to the shrine at Puṇavāyil (Mutaliyār, Periya purāṇam commentary). v. 2. "The Goddess in Āṇaikkā": "āṇaikkāvīl aṇaikwai." According to the local legend of the temple at Āṇaikkā, in this place Śiva revealed himselt in the form of the Goddess as Śakti (power) to Brahmā, the creator. "Rare conch": valampuri, a kind of conch that spirals towards the right; it is considered to be a valuable object.

the King in the ancient town of Atikai, the Lord who lives in Aiyāru, fate and fame, the light that the gods desire and seek, the treasure, the young shoot of wisdom when I think of him, my heart is filled with joy.

4
Our pearl in Purampayam, gold in Pukalür, world-illumining sun in Uraiyür and Cirāppalli's high hill, eye for those who can see in Kalukkunru of roaring cataracts—
I have reached the royal lion of Atikai Vīraṭṭāṇam's holy shrine.

5 Great gem in Kölakkä, poison-eater who dwells in Kutamükku, sweet honey in Alańkätu, rare flower that crowns immortal heads, ripe fruit soaked in milk, pure gold in Paräytturai, the tridentbearer, incomparable god, I have worshipped him to my heart's content.

6
The ruby who dwells in Marukal, flower garland in Valañculi, wish-giving tree in Karukāvūr, bright flame hard to behold, the birthless one in Peruvēļūr, our beloved Lord in holy Vänciyam who never leaves his lovers,
I have placed him in my heart.

The handsome royal lion, gorgeous bull in Irâmēccuram, our dancer on Kurrālam's hill, who embraces the breast of the Goddess with the beautifully dressed hair, eternal bridegroom who lives in Neṭuṅkaļam of shady groves, flame-hued Father, I have encircled him in love's embrace.

B Crescent moon that rises in the evening, the bridegroom who lives in Maraikkātu, sweet juice of sugar cane, my gracious Lord in Aṇṇāmalai, Faultless one who appears as the light in Turutti, city of gardens, the Lord of the celestial gods, I have devoured him in desire.

9

Our light in Corrutturai, pure gem in Turutti, King of Palanam on the river, our rare gem in Alavay, sliver of moon in Neyttanam, with broad ash-smeared shoulders, mighty ocean, proud bull, I have worshipped him to my heart's content.

10

Pure one in Puttūr, fighting bull in Pūvaṇam, sprouting seed in Milalai, brahmin in Vēļvikkuṭi, he who burned the enemy's three cities, ancient one who lives in Potiyil, healing draught in Māttūr, I have placed him within my heart.

11

Their sin will be destroyed, who bathe him in a flood of loving thought, and offer the garland of song at his feet, saying, "My Father, my Lord and Master!" to the firstborn one, rider on the strong white bull, the god who is the color of the sunset sky, and quelled the demon's might.

2 The Lord's Emblems

(POEMS 144-153)

Hail Śiya!

144. Campantar III.307 NAMACCIVĀYAT TIRUPPATIKAM (THI HOLY HYMN OF "HAIL ŠIVA!")

1
It guides to the good path
all those who melt with love and flow with tears as they chant it.
It is the essence of the four Vedas.
Chant our Lord's name; say, "Hail Śiva!"

When true devotees say it, it is like honey from fragrant flowers. It is the crown jewel of pure gold for the whole world.

Chant our Lord's name; say, "Hail Śiva!"

Thinking of him, great love welling up in their heart, if they finger the akṣa beads, it will bring them the glory of the gods.

Chant our naked Lord's name; say "Hail Śiva!"

144-146, "Namaccivāya": Tamil for the Sanskrit chant "namaḥ śwāya," the refrain of the Vedie Śatarudrīya stotra. In Poem 145, verse 1 is believed to be a reference to an actual event in Appar's life. The Jams, angry with Appar for reconverting to Śaivism, bound him to a heavy rock, and cast him into the ocean. To their amazement, upon the saint's chanting "Hail Śiva!" the rock floated up in the water, and Appar emerged unhurt. See Poem 241. Verse 2 is modeled after a verse gente in classical Sanskrit poetry in which the device of parallel definition of diverse objects is employed. In Poem 146, "Pañcakkaram": Sanskrit pañcākṣara, the five syllables of the "namaḥ śivāya" mantra.

4
Yama's henchmen themselves will fear those who chant it
with sweet sincerity.
Chant the name of the three-eyed god
dear to his pious devotees; say, "Hail Śiva!"

5
Evil will fall away
from those who say it,
even from murderers and wicked men.
Chant the good Lord's name; say, "Hail Śiva!"

145. Appar IV.11 Namaccivāyat tiruppatikam (The Holy Hymn of "Hail Siva!")

When I sincerely worship the sweet golden feet of the radiant immortal, the brahmin who is the essence of the Veda, even if I were to be bound to a rock and cast into the sea, the chant of "Hail Śiva!" would save me!

The full-bloomed lotus is the ornament of flowers; to provide for Aran's bathing rite is the ornament of the cow; impartial rule is the ornament of kings; the chant of "Hail Śiva!" is the ornament of the tongue,

146. Campantar III.280.1 PAÑCÁKKARAP PATIKAM (THE HYMN OF THE FIVE SACRED SYLLABLES)

Remember every day with an aching heart, remember in sleep and in waking, the five syllables that kicked out and terrified

Death himself, come to take away the innocent boy who praised the Lord's feet.

147. Appar V.174 Marperu

The Lord of Marperu and the Goddess dwell with delight in the hearts of even the most ignorant of his devotees who chant with feeling the five holy syllables of his name.

Have no fear, O heart!
Meditate on Aran's names every day.
If you wish to be rid of karma, just say:
"O Lord who swallowed the great bitter poison!"
And Mārpēru's Lord will reveal himself as buried treasure.

3
O rogues who quote the Lawbooks!
Of what use are your caste and clan?
Just bow to Mārpēru's Lord as your sole refuge—
In an instant, his grace will be yours.

4
I'll say it again,
listen, you wretched people!
Chant the five sacred syllables,
the fruit of great penance,
and you will gain the Lord who abides in Māṛpēṛu as the cure for your stubborn disease.

5
I'll proclaim this aloud,
O people of the earth!
If you praise the bull rider's feet,
the Lord of Mārpēru will conquer Death,
and rule you as flawless gold,
answer to all your prayers!

6 Even if you have lost the great wealth you had earned,

147, v. 3. "Clan": "köttiram" (gotra). Brahmins trace their lineage through gotras ("families") of Vedic seers. Campantar belonged to the Kayuniya (Sanskrit "Kaundinya") gotra. "Caste": "kulam," "family." v. 4. "I'll say it again": "iruntu colluvan," literally, "I will declare emphatically."

even if Death the Ender's call is near, if you just cry, "Save me, O great dancer in the burning-ground!" Märperu's Lord will end your pain.

7
If you wail, "O Aran, My Lord,"
you will be saved.
If you just think of his rosy feet,
Māṛpēṛu's Lord who protects the universe will make you rule the world.

10
If you exclaim,
"Māṛpēṛu, in whose woods monkeys leap,
is the place of him who bore down to crush from head to foot the demon who tried to lift the hill!"
Endless bliss is yours.

148. Cuntarar VII.48 Pāņţikkoţumuţi

I
Renouncing all my ties, I think only of your holy feet.
Thinking of them, I have achieved
the purpose of my birth.
O good sage of Pāṇṭikkoṭumuṭi shrine in fine Karaiyūr praised by the wise, even if I should forget you, my tongue
would still say: "Hail Siva!"

2
Friend, the days when I ignored
those who praise your feet,
the days on which I myself have failed you,
I think of these as evil days.
O dancer in Pāṇṭikkoṭumuṭi worshipped by the Kaveri with the garland of her circling stream!
Even if I should forget you, my tongue
would still say, "Hail Siva!"

3 I will think of the day on which I should forget you as the day of my death, the day when the senses fail, the day life leaves the body, the day when I shall be carried away on the bier. O poet in glorious Pāṇṭikkoṭumuṭi washed by the Kaveri's cool, swelling tide, Even if I should forget you, my tongue would still say, "Hail Siva!"

The Lord's Trident, Ash, and Bull

149. Appar IV.110 Tünkanaimațam

1
O bright flame
of cloud-covered Tüńkāṇaimāṭam in Kaṭantai,
I ask a boon of your golden feet!
If you would save the soul of this ardent devotee, banish dark Death, place your trident's bright seal on me!

O beloved of your devotees, if you fail to take pity on me, and cure my disease, thinking, "What does my little servant seek?" the blame will be yours.

So, blessed Lord of Tūnkāṇaimāṭam in Kaṭantai of lotus pools, cover me with ash from your holy feet!

O my true God who lives in Tānkānaimāṭam
in Kaṭantai of dark groves that touch the moon!
With a single toe you suppressed
the demon who tried to take Kailāsa because it hindered the course of his chariot wheels.
When will you take me,
having placed on me
the emblem of your bull white as the snowy peak?

149, v. 2. "Disease": "arumpininoy," literally, "wasting disease," probably refers both to karma and to the physical ailment from which Appar suffered before his reconversion to Saivism. The Lord's emblems are invoked as signs of his grace.

Śiva's Feet

150, Appar IV.97.1 Cattimugram

Before Death the king destroys me with swift strength, brand me with the print of your flower-feet! If you fail,

O Siva-sprout who dwells in holy Cattimurram, you who bear the crackling fire in your hand, deadly karma will surely engulf me!

151. Appar IV.82 Kalumalam

The Lord of Kalumalam's feet possess us—feet that dance in the ancient modes as his goblins sing, striking up their parai drums that resound all over the world, and pious men listen to the Vedic chant and the discourse on the sacred texts.

7
O heart, think of the Lord of Souls who can destroy powerful binding karma
as soon as your thoughts turn to Kalumalam!
Surpassing those who believe that their bonds will be severed only when they join Śiva, worship the feet that possess us forever!

152. Appar IV.95 Patirippuliyür

Always think of them as your support, O heart! Though the surging ocean surround and cover the whole earth, I see a refuge for us, the dear feet of our friend, Umā's lover, holy Pātirippuliyūr's Lord, who wears the streak of the young moon as a wreath on his hair.

^{151.} v. ". "Lord of Souls": "pacupatt," also "Lord of Beasts." "Powerful binding karma": "pantiturunta calisma," karmic bonds of the past. The root "āl-" is used in the sense of "so rule" as well as "to possess."

^{152,} v. 9. "Twin lights": "tructeur," the sun and the moon.

Though earth crash into the nether world, the rising ocean cover all, though the seven worlds lose their bearing in space and the twin lights fall, do not fear, O heart!
We have found for ourselves a support, the feet of the Lord of holy Patirippuliyür, the bright god with the forehead eye.

153. Appar IV.81.10 Köyil (Tillai)

The foot raised to kill the Moon at Dakşa's sacrifice, the foot which sent Death to his death, the foot which Nārāyaṇa and Brahmā sought in vain to see, the foot raised in dance in Tillai's Little Ampalam hall—that is the foot which possesses us!

Appar - Tillai

3 Pain and Grace

(POEMS 154-180)

Despair

154. Appar IV.79 Kurainta Tirunéricai (The Sacred Néricai Poem of Despair)

Why was I born,
I who cared only for my pride,
I who was caught in women's snares,
I who failed to think of my dear kinsman,
my ambrosia, the world's beginning and end,
my Lord whose form bright as the sunset sky
lay buried within my heart?

Once, a slave of past karma, I failed to remember my Lord. Now, having gone mad, I babble like a fool. I cannot hold in my heart the god who is all the goodness that dwells in me. Why was I born?

155. Appar IV.113.10

How can the likes of me ever behold you, when even those who are like you could not grasp your greatness with their vision when they tried to challenge you,

O brahmin with a shining crown of thick matted hair that glitters like gold, ^{154. &}quot;Kurainta" in the title of this hymn suggests a range of emotions from complaint to despair.

^{155. &}quot;Those who are like you": "numary oppar" connotes the gods Brahmā and Viṣṇu, who tried to behold Siva in his tull glory as the column of flame.

mingles with the hue of fire. surpasses the color of the sunset. and shines like a flash of lightning?

156. Appar IV.113

You have never let me think of you. If ever I remember you, at once you make me forget and turn to other things. Tell me, is there anyone like me. ever unaware, yet ever dear to you? Long life to you, O Lord!

If my red-hued Lord with the blessed name "Śiva" were to bless me with his grace and possess me. then, if I wander for many days crying, "O Bhava!" he will reveal himself to me, saying, "This man has been calling out to me for a long time!"

157. Cuntarar VII.51 Tiruvārūr

I know the nature of the disease that afflicts me, makes me a sinner. makes me stop loving and serving the Lord: I hasten to worship him. How long must I, a fool, be parted from my Lord. the one whom karma cannot bind. great gem, my diamond, my God in Ārūr?

How can I bear to be parted from my dear ambrosia with the dark throat and the long matted hair, 157, v. 1. "The one whom karma cannot bind": with the Tevaram Pondicherry edition, ! read "muttanai" ("the one who is eternally free"), instead of "muttinai" ("the pearl").

great Siva who burned to ashes with his holy red eye the Love-god who assaulted him with his five arrows—my God in Ārūr?

How can I, fool born into this miserable body destined for death, bear to die, parted from my Father who devoured the poison to calm the distress of the suppliant gods who were burned by the venom that arose from the vast ocean rich in shells—my God in Ārūr?

158. Appar IV.20.1 Tiruvārūr (Ārūr)

To see you was my only thought.
You entered my heart,
and I seized your dancing feet.
You cannot leave me now,
O Father in Tiruvārūr
where flags fluttering on great mansions touch the young moon in the sky!

159. Appar V.171.1 Kölili

I failed to think of you in the past. I have yet to praise your feet. Still,
O King of holy Kölili where there are many paddy fields, do not forget me!

160. Appar IV.75

1 What is my sin that I, his servant, have passed my life

160, v. 4. In this verse Appar describes the process by which the self (uyir) is illumined in and by the luminous knowledge of Siva (rianat ti: "fire of knowledge"). Right cognition or knowledge maters pattern unarray, which can be achieved only through Siva's grace (arul), is only the first step toward the supreme knowledge, which is the mystical state of civa-without seeing the worship of Kantan, my Lord, without seeing him bathed with the pure water of the Kaveri, to the sound of the Vedic chant, without seeing him adorned with saffron paste, and garlands of flowers?

In the body's house make a lamp of the heart.

Pour right cognition as butter, shape the wick that is the self, light it with the fire of the supreme knowledge of the Lord. The vision of the anklet-adorned feet of the Lord, the father of the youth who is in the katampu tree will then be yours.

6
I love him who dwells in the hearts of his lovers, whose great self is love itself.
Desiring to see him, I melt; melting, I waste away.
How shall my heart,
ant trapped on a two-headed firebrand, join my Father, the great Lord?

7 Like carrion crows
alighting on a carcass, evil deeds from the past swarm upon me, delude me,
silence my words of praise for you.
O Lord of the universe,
give me right knowledge, so that I may shed
this putrid, loathsome form, oozing with pus, this wound ridden with foul disease!

nāṇam ("knowledge of Śiva"), the condition to which the Tamil Śaiva aspires. The conception of the yogic vision of Śiva as the luminous presence within the self is developed in detail in the great texts of the Śaiva Siddhānta, especially in the works of Uyyavantatēvar (Tiruk-kaliṛruppāṭiyār), Aruṇanti (Civañāṇapōṭam), and Umāpati Civam (Tiruvaruṭpayaṇ). The earliest exposition of the idea can be found in Tirumlaris Tirumantiram. See Dhavamony, Love of God. "The youth who sits under the kaṭampu tree" is the Tamil hill-god Murukaṇ, identified with Skanda-Kārttikeya, one of the two sons of Śiva and Pārvati. This verse has a famous parallel in the verse "aṇpē takaliyāka" by the early Ālvār Pūtam in the Vaisṇava Nālāyrrat tuviyap pirapantam. v. 6. "Ant trapped on a two-headed firebrand" ("irutalai miṇgukiṇra kolļi mēl crumpu") is a proverbial expression in Tamil for a person caught in an inescapable situation or dilemma.

Supplication

161. Campantar III.303.1 Tirsevārsir

The one who is the end and beginning of the universe, the brahmin who wears the white ash, my father in Tiruvārūr who has entered my heart—When will he take me?

162. Appat IV.95.6 Patirippuliyür

Lying in the womb, I thought only of your feet.
Committing it to memory, I recited your name.
Through your grace, I chanted "Hail Siva," and wore the sacred ash as the sign of my blessing.
O Aran of Pātirippuliyūr, give me your own state of Siva!

163. Appar IV.100.6 Kacci Ekampam

From the day I entered the womb
my heart longed for the vision of your feet.
I am weary from a life of suffering and pain.
Lord of Tiruvorijur, holy Ālavāy's god,
Lord in Tiruvārūr,
seeing that I have given up everything but you,
O Ēkampan of Kacci, won't you take pity on me?

164. Cuntarar VII.15 Nățțiyattănkuți

I won't be afraid of the snake that is your belt, won't mock your dance in the burning-ground.

161. "[My father] . . . / who has entered my heart": "cmtaiyē pukuntān." "Cintai": literally, "meditation, contemplation."

162. "The state [condition] of Siva": "civakati," the supreme state.

^{164,} v. 3. "Marker": "lovely," or "resting on clouds." "Fearlessly" is probably an allu-

You may not care for me, yet I'll call you my Lord. Even if I'll never be born again, I'll never forget you. Though you won't look at me, I will still see you, though you won't love me, I'll still love you in my heart, and never stop singing the praise of your feet, O King of Nāṭṭiyattāṇkuṭi!

2
Lord with the divine form, explain the wonder of your dwelling in the heart of a base man like me, who loves the dance you perform at night in the burning-ground, with a beautiful snake for your belt.
Gem who rids us of our gathered karma,
ruby-colored Lord,
I won't love anyone but you,
O King of Nāṭṭiyattāṇkuṭi!

When I can fearlessly serve you, what more could I want?
O supreme Lord who shares your form with the mountain's daughter with tender feet, ruby-colored gem with the lovely white moon on your red hair, you who hold the poison in your throat and carry a white skull,
O King of Nāṭṭiyattāṇkuṭi!

4
I do not lack learning, yet although I am your slave,
I learned nothing about your greatness.
I am no wayward soul, yet I can't understand the ways of those who follow your way.
I cannot sing your golden feet and hope to be saved by my songs.
I am a good man to no one but yourself,
O King of Nāṭṭiyattānkuṭi!

sion to Siva's horrific acts and attributes, such as the snake and the dance on the burning-ground. v. 6. "Pāccil in the West" is the town of Pāccilācciramam on the river Kollitam (Coleroon). In the final verse, Cuntarar refers to Kōṭpuli, one of the sixty-three Nāyaṇārs. Kōṭpuli of Nāṭṭiyattāṇkuṭi was a devout Śaiva and a general in the Cola army. This Nāyaṇār's claim to sainthood stems from the incident in which he put to the sword his own kinsmen and friends for having consumed, during a famine, the grain he had dedicated to the temple for feeding Śaiva devotees. Cuntarar describes Kōṭpuli as a koṭṇaṇ, "one who is like pincers or jaws." Kōṭpuli is said to have given to the saint his two daughters, Cunkaṇ and Vaṇappakai, whom Cuntarar brought up as his own daughters.

I won't love those who do not love the husband of the mountain's daughter with flower-scented hair.
Though you won't be attached to me, I'll cling to you.
Always serving those who serve your feet,
I will sing of you alone.
Since I love you, seeking to know you through devotion and song.
I cannot forget you,
O King of Nāṭṭiyattāṇkuṭi!

6
Since it is in my karma and nature to suffer,
I won't blame you for all I have suffered,
O cool raincloud who dwells in Pāccil in the West,
King who kicked Death!
Lord who is half woman,
brahmin who loves to bathe in offerings of milk, yoghurt, and ghee, though you'll go away from me,
I'll keep walking toward your feet,
O King of Nāṭṭiyattāṇkuṭi!

O handsome Lord, you who wear the five-hooded snake with the crescent moon on your hair!
Chief of the immortal gods!
With all my heart I have fixed my aim upon my goal.
Wanting to be saved, I have reached your feet.
Though you won't love me, I will love you still, for did I not once become your slave so that I might melt with love for you,
O King of Nāṭṭiyattānkuti?

I can't be proud, valuing this human life—when I think of it, my eyes fill with tears. I will not slander your habit of begging for food, nor mock you for riding a bull.

Though I might rise in the world, I'll never stop worshipping you.
I can't bear the thought of future births, so I won't press and entreat anyone but you, O King of Nāṭṭiyattānkuṭi!

9

Yes, the Jains and Buddhists, no better than demons, may get their way, with their lies and deception, and I may have to see all the wealth they've piled up with their cheating. But listen, O god who rides the bull, who is so dear to me: you are the one I really know. I see those who worship you, serve you, and then I worship you as well and put a stop to all my karma.

Listen, O King of Näṭṭiyattānkuṭi where there are crabs playing in fields surrounded by green groves!

10

Even if you have no wish to sing, O devotees, sing him and sever the bonds of sin!

Sing this hymn composed by the poet of Tiruvärür, father of Cinkati with the long hair adorned with flowers, poet who never forgets the King of Nättiyattänkuti, famous old town in the Cola land, home of Kötpuli, terrible as the jaws of death, who defeated enemy kings in combat.

165. Cuntarar VII.24 Malapāți

Wearing the loincloth and waistband, my body smeared with sacred ash, I have taken refuge at your feet.

Take me, my Lord!

Lover of the Goddess with eyes curved like swords, ruby in Malapāṭi, friend, tell me, whom can I think of but you?

3
My father and mother can't be of the slightest help to me.
Caught in the chain of birth and death,
I am worn down by the world-illusion.
Ruby in Malapāṭi surrounded by great dark flowering groves, O Father, tell me,
whom can I think of but you?

165. I have taken the Tevāram Pondicherry edition reading "kēlā" ("O friend") instead of the Tevāram Kaļakam edition reading "ālāy," "possessed by you," "as your servant."

US 267 W Soliton

166. Appar IV.23 Koyıl/Tıllar

I can't sing like a true devotee,
O God, great yogi! Un who will be some to see your dance.

Seeing your dance, I will praise you.

Singing and dancing, I will hail you, crying,
"O Lord, First among the Three!"
You who put an end to the misery

8
What shall I do, O god with the dark throat, if my mind is confused, and daily slips from the highest path? I, your servant, have come to see all your dances in the Little Ampalam in Tillai where the Vedas flourish in full glory.

of those who sing your praise, O Dancer in Tillai's Little Ampalam, even I have come to see your dance.

Having failed to purify my heart, and to make me meditate on you as I should, have you not deceived me, O Lord of the immortals? And yet, handsome one, you dance, as your soft-spoken lady watches, in the little hall in Tillai, town of cloud-kissed groves!

10
Māl who are earth as a child and Ayan who has the lotus seat,

166. In verse 10 Appar refers to a myth of Visnu in his incarnation as Krishna. When the women of the cowherd village complained to Yasoda, saying that the child Krishna had eaten dirt. Yasoda asked him to open his mouth; inside his mouth she saw the entire universe. "Abiding wealth" ("timminta tiru") suggests release as well as worldly wealth.

in vain desired to see your holy form that pervaded space. Yet, O Supreme Lord, you dance to the music of modes in the little hall of Tillai, home of our abiding wealth!

167. Cuntarar VII.5 Onakantanrali

Those who worship you every day with yoghurt and milk and ghee don't get a penny for their devotion! You who live in Oṇakāntanrali, won't you show me a way to release as I wallow in this deep pit, dancing to the tune of the five senses, and won't be saved unless I worship your holy feet?

2
The goddess Ganga, whose waves flow over your moon-crowned matted hair, is a silent woman; Ganapati has a potbelly, spear-bearing Kumaran is a mere boy. As for the Goddess, she is no strict mistress.

167. This hymn is typical of Cuntarar's direct, immediate voice and his penchant for mixing the sublime with the mundane. In every verse Cuntarar criticizes Siva's poverty and his odd habits, the poverty and suffering of his devotees, his unresponsiveness to them in their need. v. 2. "She is no strict mistress": "korrattiyalal," "she who can't rule with a stick" can also be taken to mean "all she knows is how to play the yal." Ganapati: The elephantfaced god, son of Siva, Kumaran: "The youth" (Sanskrit kumara), another name of Murukan, v. 6. The Kāmakkôttam ("Abode of Kāma") is the shrine in which the Goddess, as Kâmākṣī ("She with the eyes of Desire"), is separately established in Kanchipuram (Kacci). According to local legends, the Goddess established the Kāmakköttam shrine in Kanchi in order to practice charity according to the sacred Law; hence the irony in Siva's beggarly way of life. Separate Kāmakkottam shrines for Goddess-consorts became popular in Cola times; Cuntarar's reference affirms the antiquity of the Kanchi shrine. Since "ar" (v. 9) can mean both "fine/precious," and "who?/someone," Cuntarar punningly speaks of Arur as "nobody's town." "No place to call your own": "orriy urel ummatanru" is a pun on the name of the town of Orrivur, literally "you do not even have a mortgaged village." The poet mocks Siva for having "raised up" his wife, implying that he is under her control. The goddess Uma, referred to in verse 2, creates other problems, being too softhearted to help Siva rule his devotees with the necessary firmness. In verse 10 the poet describes Siva as the Androgyne.

You who live in Oṇakāntanṛaļi, tell me, how can we serve a master with such a family?

Jacob Who lives in Önakäntantali, you won't be reasonable, won't take pity on the devotees who see you as their sole support, who love and worship your feet even when you give them nothing in return. What should we do in times of need, in poverty and misfortune—pawn you so that we can eat?

I have praised you, saying all I can say, but I can't get anything out of you.

Öṇakāntaṇṭaḷi's Lord, tell me, how will you rule us when you won't give up this wretched life of wandering all day with a toothless skull for a begging bowl?

You don't grant grace to your devotees who dance, and sing songs to the proper beat, who weep and melt with love for you, and gather to worship you in every way.

Though I am weary, wandering about, looking for you, you never think of me.

You won't run away from me, yet you won't give me a hand, Onakantantali's Lord!

Lord who lives in Ōṇakantanṛali, why do you go begging for alms in the ancient city of Kacci with its dark woods, when your Goddess who has long, dark hair and eyes curved like swords, the mountain's daughter who wears the koṇṛai garland brimming with honey on her high breasts, abides here in the Kāmakkōṭṭam shrine for the salvation of the world?

I fritter my life away in lies,
I'm neither a temple servant nor your devotee.
You have not possessed me with your truth,
nor given me hope for the future state.
Even if I were your servant,
you would ask nothing of me, give nothing,
say nothing to me!
Yet are you not my Master from former lives,
O Lord who lives in Onakantangali?

I hear that Death has come with his noose to take me away, yet I can't put strength into my heart, can't worship your feet and be saved! I can't join you, since I burn in this pit of lust and envy, anger, pride and greed, of every vice in the book, Önakäntangali's Lord!

What can your devotees who serve your holy feet with the sacred rites get for their love? Your necklace is a snake, you live in Ārūr, a town that belongs to nobody; Orriyūr is a mortgaged city, you have no place to call your own. You have raised the goddess Gangā up on your head, you've made her your wife! Your home is the burning-ground, and your robe, the flayed hide, O Lord who lives in Ōnakāntanraļi!

10
Sin will be annihilated for those who can sing
this sequence of ten Tamil verses in which Ārūran has described Ōnakāntanrali's Lord who has the poet for his bondservant, the bull rider who is manifest as the primal syllable "Aum," and binds the colorful sari with a silken scarf over his loincloth.

The Refuge

168. Appar IV.114.10

Though the mountains should shrivel, slowly scorched by the sun, though the dark ocean dry up, and the rains fail for a long time, yet do not fear, O heart, that famine would grip the land, for we have a refuge on this wide earth, a high golden hill with three unwinking eyes!

169. Appar IV,113.8

What though the sky fall, what though the earth quake, what though the mountains slip and slide, what though the cold sea be drained and the great lights fall?
What matter all this to the noble souls who serve the one God who stands unblemished, having devoured the ocean's poison?

The Humble Poet

170. Appar VI.305.1 Egumpiyür

I don't know pure Tamil for song,
I can't make poems.
I knew nothing of science, and the modes of music,
of all the arts that are his own self,
and of his greatness.
He revealed his power and his way

168, 169. Siva is compared to the golden cosmic mountain (Meru). "Great lights": the sun and the moon. Compare Poem 152.

170. Appar's disavowal of learning and competence as a poet is more typical of the bhakti poet's attitude toward his art than the pride in achievement expressed by Campantar in his coda verses. See Ramanujan, Speaking of Siva, pp. 37–42.

to me, an ignorant man.
Like a loving mother and father,
he followed me, a refugee,
and took me for his own.
Thus have I been blessed, to have sought and attained
my ruby on lovely Erumpiyūr's hill, the golden flame.

The Lord's Grace

171. Cuntarar VII.14 Pāccilācciramam

The peerless Lord gave me a head, heart, and thoughts to serve him alone.
Yet I would be boasting if I were to say that I was a true servant to him.
Alas, if I lose the madman's love,
do I have no Master
other than the supreme Lord who lives in Pāccilācciramam, girded with the hooded serpent and loincloth?

2
I don't call you "father" or "mother,"
"O Lord," is good enough for me.
Yet Lord, you won't consider me one of your creatures, won't show me even a little of your grace.
Alas, if he waits too long to bless his devotees, do I have no Master other than the Lord who lives in Pāccilācciramam where wild geese swim in the lakes?

6 I am afraid of evil karma, so I won't go the way

171. The refrain of this hymn ("ivaralātillaiyo pirāṇār": "Do I have no Master other than him") can be taken as a rhetorical question. The mood of this poem combines despair with cynicism. v. 11. "Seven births" or "seven times seven births" is a popular expression for the notion of karmic effect resulting in rebirth. Tradition connects this reference to servanthood stretching over several births with the legend of Cuntarar's conversion in Tiruvenneynallur (see Section IV below).

of men who practice false ascetic vows.

My Lord knows that I know nothing but the penance of service at his feet.

Alas, do I have no Master other than Pāccilācciramam's Lord who bears the trident, though he wears nothing but the white ash?

9

Melting in a stream of love, run to join him, O heart,
perform his loving service every day!
Paccil's Lord saves those who call him their Lord before the end of their days,
even without love in their hearts.
Do I have no Master other than him,
if, in spite of all my pleas,
he won't forgive my sins
and reward me for my love?

10

When I meditate on him with devotion, when I envision his form as he appears dressed in rags, covered with powdery white ash, my heart remembers only the Lord with the throat like a sapphire, the tongue speaks of him alone. If he has embraced and possessed me, but won't let me serve him, do I have no Master other than the Lord in Pāccilācciramam who wears the hooded snake?

11

Not only in this birth, but in all seven births have I been servant to you, and to all your servants, too.

I belong to you by birthright, my heart melts for you, show me your bright feet soft as flowers!

Alas, do I have no Master other than my Lord in Pāccilācciramam, who blesses those who have earned coveted fame, if his petty ways toward me belie the great promises he made?

I have never reproached my Lord, never condemned him.
I am known as one who always sings hymns in my Lord's praise.
Alas, do I have no Master other than him,
if he takes offense
at the words of the poet Ārūraṇ of Nāvalūr of fertile fields, who worships the feet of Pāccilacciramam's Lord, sings him with his tongue,
and long remembers him in his heart?

172. Appar V.133.9 Katampür

The Lord of the holy karakköyil temple in South Kaṭampūr, the spouse of the Goddess, mother of our Kaṭampaṇ—his task is to save even this lowly servant.

My task is only to serve.

173. Appar IV.103.5 Aritr (Tiruvāritr)

You destroyed the god who held the sugar cane bow and gave happiness to the boy who wielded the axe as his weapon.

Seeing these,

O Lord who lives in pretty Ārūr surrounded by cool, blossoming groves, how should I know your heart's pleasure, and what should I ask of you?

174. Campantar II.176.6 Piramapuram (Cīrkāļi)

Wherever his devotees are born, into whatever form or birth, to bless them with his grace in that very form

172. Katampan: Murukan. Karakköyil: An apsidal temple.

173. "The god who held the sugar-cane bow": Kama. "The boy who wielded the axe": Canficar.

174. "In that very form": "inkey enru," "in that very condition," "in the particular circumstances of their lives."

is the nature of Śańkara, my bull-riding Lord with body bright as the white conch, who lives in Piramapuram, cool with groves of fragrant flowers.

175. Appar V.161.11 Kacci Ekampam

Our Lord is the one who bore down with his toe when Rāvaṇa, Lankā's king, lifted his hill.

And he is the one who gave the demon the good course when he cried in distress:

"Save me, O Ēkampan of Kacci!"

176. Cuntarar VII.21 Kacci Mērraļi

I
O everlasting light burning bright,
I thought only of you.
You came to me,
and have never left me since.
Focus of all my thoughts,
Lord who dwells in the holy Western shrine, Father, I will sing
no one but you.

6
I thought only of your feet.
At once you entered this carnal frame.
O my bright flame,
honey, sweet ambrosia,
King who dwells in the holy Western shrine,
I will joyfully sing
no one but you.

177. Cuntarar VII.23.2 Kalippālai

You who abide in Kalippālai, wherever I, your servant,

175. "Good course": "nalarikol celaru," "good lite"; "the course that leads to one's welfare," "the path to release."

^{176.} Kacci Merrali: "The Western shrine in Kacci," The Merrali is one of the many Siva shrines in Kanchipuram, city of temples.

think of you, you join me there and grant me grace. You are Ganga's Lord who severs my karmic bonds, and takes me right here!

178. Cuntarar VII.58 Kaļumalam (Cirkāļi)

My Master who chose me, saved me from birth and death, and gave me grace, the gem who exalted the mountain's daughter by placing her in half his frame, my Lord who bears the flowing river in his hair, he who has mingled with my stranger's heart like water with red-hot iron, the god with the eight forms, our King who wears the white conch earring on one ear, I have seen him in the fair town of Kalumalam which once floated on the ocean's flood.

I won't look for another friend in this birth or the next.

Once I grieved, then received the gift of lasting remembrance of him.

I have given up my family and friends,
I worship the bright flame as my only friend, my God who gave me the teaching, guiding me in their proper course through the paths of knowledge and release, ways that the gods themselves cannot know. I, his servant, have beheld him in the fair town of Kalumalam.

3
The father of Cëntan in holy Tinainakar, pure gold that cuts through the chain of karma,
the golden one—
I know none other than him:

178. Cuntarar refers to the Cīrkāļi flood myth in verse 1. Cēntan (v. 3): Murukan. Ūran (v. 10): Ārūran, citizen of Ārūr, or Nāvalūran, poet from Nāvalūr. The kuļai, mentioned in verses 1, 4, and 5, is a man's earring. v. 1. veņkuļai: "white earring": v. 5. "kunṭalankuļai": kunṭalan is another term for a man's earring. In his androgynous form, Šiva wears the kulai on one ear, and the toṭu, a woman's earring, on the other.

I have received this knowledge, as my means to release.
Once, having seen in my dream the one who is the old man and the child, I lost my vision, and awoke in despair.
I have now seen the god with the dancing feet in the fair seaside town of Kalumalam.

I have won over my Lord who wears the konrai which blooms in the rains;
I have won a heart that will never forget him.
Once a sinner, I have now been raised to the birthless state—who is so fortunate as I?
I behold my Lord with the dark throat and the gold earring,
I sing of him, and will unite with him;
I have seen him in the fair town of Kalumalam with the groves of tall sugar cane and plantain trees.

Raving, "O god with the golden earring on one ear, youth with the deadly battle-axe, Lord who wears the konrai blossom swarming with bees,"
I worshipped him with the proper sacred rite.
Uniting my roving thoughts of the past in the one thought of him,
I wandered in Pasupati's sacred abodes for a long time, till
I found him in the fair town of Kalumalam, where every day the tide sweeps over the beautiful shore covered with the screwpine.

Thinking of the enormous evil karma I must endure, I grieved, then received the gift of lasting remembrance of my Lord. Loving him, my heart thrilled, I prayed to him, worshipping him with the proper rite. My bud, my blossom, ambrosia, my honey, my Master, my God, the sugar cane that will uproot the tree of my birth, I have seen him in the fair town of Kalumalam, full of lush paddyfields.

Sorrow and suffering will never touch those devotees who worship the Lord with flowers, and with these ten verses that the poet Uran, Caṭaiyan's loving son, having seen the holy feet of the Lord in the fair town of Kalumalam, has sung on those feet that true devotees alone may know, who shed tears, thinking only of the Lord with the crown of matted hair adorned by the konrai and kūvilam flowers.

179. Appar IV.103.10 Tiruvārūr

Sound the conch at dawn!
Light fragrant incense!
I am possessed
by the lotus feet of the Lord who once bore down with his toe to crush, till the crimson blood flowed, the demon who tried to lift the beautiful hill with his twenty shoulders.

180. Cuntarar VII.90 Köyil (Tillai)

Rejoice, O heart, we have attained our Lord of Puliyūr's Little Ampalam, who dances with foot raised, holding the drum, blazing fire, and the black snake in his swaying hands, the Lord who will save you not only when you serve the dancing god, but all your life, even when Dharma's men grind you in the mill.

180. The refrain of this poem evokes a vision of hell that is part of South Indian popular religion and folklore. Yama or Yamadharmaraja, god of Death, fits punishments to evil deeds in the hell of his realm (Yamaloka [Tamil namanulakuj); among the tortures to be dreaded is being cast into (oil-)mills to be slowly ground. The phrase "tatuttātkoļvan" (translated as "he who will save you/us") in the refrain in verses 1, 5, 9, and 10 literally means: "he who intervenes, leads one away from harmful ways, and possesses one." The expression is associated with Cuntarar's own conversion in Venneynallar, which Siva effected in a truly dramatic manner. See Section IV below. In verse 4 Cuntarar expresses his loyalty to the Pallava king.

Rejoice, for we have attained our Lord of noble Puliyūr's Little Ampalam, who severs the bonds with which dark Death's henchmen have bound us, the god who gives us his precious world, and tortures kings who fail to pay tribute to the Pallava, rightful ruler of the earth.

Rejoice, for we have attained our Master, our Lord of Puliyūr's Little Ampalam, the god who wears the black buckskin, and has the white moon for a wreath on his hair, him who violently kicked aside Death with the thundrous roar, and gave immortality to the boy, him who shall save us when Dhafma's men grind us in the mill!

9
Rejoice, O heart, for we have attained our Lord of glorious Puliyūr's Little Ampalam, who will save us when King Dharma's henchmen grind us in the mill,
the god who has condemned to ignorance
the stupid Jains and the stinking Buddhist monks—always serve him well!

Rejoice, for we have attained, in Puliyūr's Little Ampalam, the spouse of Umā, the Goddess whose mound of Venus is like the hood of the winding cobra, Lord with the bright-eyed bull, god who dwells in many sacred places, and will save us when Dharma's men grind us in the mill, the poet Ārūraṇ's Master in Tiruvārūr, and Lord of Pērūr in western Konku land on the lovely Kañci's banks.

4 The Lord, My Lover

(POEMS 181-185)

181. Appar VI.239.7 Ārūr (Tiruvārūr)

Once she heard his name, then learned of his lovely form.
Then she heard of his excellent town, and fell madly in love with him.
That same day she left her mother and father and the proper ways of the world, lost herself, lost her good name.
This woman has joined the feet of the Lord, her lover.

182. Campantar I.60 Tönipuram (Cirkali)

1 King bee
who hums melodious tunes, drinking honey from lotuses in lovely rippling pools in the company of your mate!
Out of compassion for me,
won't you tell my state

181. In this poem Appar describes the progression of the devotee's love for Siva in terms of the progression of the love of a heroine for the hero in the classical akam love poems. "Form," "mūrtti," is also the technical term for the iconographic forms of Siva. "Lovely," "vannam," connotes both color and natural beauty. "Lost herself": "tannai marantal," "became completely absorbed with her lover, forgot herself." "Talaivan," which I have translated as "the Lord, her lover," can mean "the lover/hero" of Cańkam love poetry as well as "chieftain" or "master."

182. The motif of lovers employing birds, animals, and even insentient objects as messengers of love is an ancient one in Indian literature, appearing in the Rāmāyaṇa, the story of Nala and Damayantī, and elsewhere. The classic of the dūta ("messenger") genre in Sanskrit poetry is Kālidāsa's Meghadūta (Cloud-messenger). The messenger theme also appears in Tamil akam poetry, and was successfully adopted by Tamil bhakti poets such as Campantar, Māṇikkavācakar, and Nammāļvār. v. 1. The pāṇṭaraṅkam is one of Śiva's dances in the burning-ground.

to the Lord of the bright crescent moon, who wears a garland of bones on his chest, the päntarankam dancer who lives in holy Tonipuram?

10 Simple parrot imprisoned in your cage, come here, I will give you milk and honey to drink, as much as you wish, if you will speak for me just once the sweet name of the Lord who wears the bright young moon, king of Tonipuram by the sea, where the beach is strewn with clustered coral and pearls!

183. Campantar I.1 Piramapuram (Cîrkāļi)

Ber Commit He wears a woman's earring on one ear; riding on his bull, of on crowned with the pure white crescent moon, & 1600 min od his body smeared with ash from the burning-ground, & he is the thief who stole my heart.

He is the Lord who lives in fine Piramapuram, where he once blessed with his grace

Brahmā of the lotus seat who worshipped him. Palons

He bears the white crescent moon on long, matted red hair on which the river flows.

183. The Tamil Saivas regard the first hymn of the Tevaram corpus as the first hymn that the child Campantar composed, inspired by divine wisdom. Verse 1 of this hymn is also included and discussed in Section IV of the anthology, in the context of the life of Campantar (see Poem 221). As noted in Part One, the hero in Tamil akam poetry is often called a "thief" (kalvan); the refrain in Campantar's poem is "enn ullan kavar kalvan." Local legends (talapuranam) of the Cirkali temple are alluded to in verses 1 and 5: "Pıramapuram" is so called because Brahma (Tainil "Piraman") worshipped Siva at this shrine; the vimana of this temple survived the cosmic flood. The reference to the bracelets slipping from the heroine's wrist (v. 3) suggests that she is wasting away in her lovelorn state.

He who makes the noisy white shell bracelets slip from my thin wrist, is the thief who stole my heart. He is the Lord who lives in Piramapuram, famed as the firstborn city in this wide world.

They praise him, calling him the Lord who is half woman, Lord with the matted hair, god who rides the bull. He is the thief who stole my heart. He is the Lord who lives in Piramapuram, famed as the shrine which once floated on the dark ocean's cosmic flood.

184. Appar IV.6 Kalippālai

1
Her pretty coral lips murmur,
"He is the savior of the gods."
She says, "On his strong, coral-red shoulders he wears the white ash."
The girl with the coral girdle says,
"He is beyond the infinite."
Did she see the chieftain of Kalippālai's rich coral fields?

2 She says, "On his matted red hair he wears the konrai swarming with bees."
She says, "He also has the full-bloomed fragrant flower of the white erukku."
She says, "He wears a silken upper cloth, too."
Did she see the chieftain of Kalippālai's seashore tracts overgrown with the water thorn?

184. This poem is clearly modeled after akam landscape poems. In it the devotee is depicted as the lovelorn heroine of Cankam poetry, longing for her lover who is the ruler (cērppan) of seashore (neytal) tracts in Kalippālai. The voice in the poem is that of the nurse or foster mother (cevilit tāy) who is in charge of the heroine. The foster mother describes the strange delusions her daughter seems to be having; she suspects that the girl has been "possessed" by the "chieftain of Kalippālai." v. 1. "Savior of the gods" ("vāṇavarkkut tāṇavaṇ") is an allusion to the myth of Śiva's drinking of the poison. v. 2. "Water thorn": "kantu," kanṭakam, nīrmulļi.

3
She says, "The young crescent moon rests on my Lord's head."
She says, "The brilliant color of saffron is his color."
She says, "His throat is dark, like the spear-sharp eyes of his Goddess."
Did she see the chieftain of Kalippalai of the surging waves?

185. Campantar II.154 Marukal

1
"O god with matted hair!" she cries.
"You are my sole refuge!" she cries.
"Bull rider!" she cries, and faints in awe.
O Lord of Marukal
where the blue lily blooms in field waters, is it fair
to make this woman waste from love's disease?

2
"Object of my thoughts!" she cries.
"Śiva!" she cries.
"Primal Being!" she cries.
"First among the gods!" she cries.
O our father who dwells in Marukal where the blue lily blooms in clusters, is it right to afflict this woman with longing?

3 God who wears the sounding hero's band, the flame-tongued snake

185. The speaker in this poem is the heroine's (devotee's) girlfriend, one of the personae in akam love poems. The girlfriend pleads with the hero (God) to take pity on her friend (the devotee). The hagiographers suggest that Campantar sang this hymn with reference to a woman in Marukal, who was mourning her lover's death by snakebite. At the end of the hymn, Siva revived the young man, and the lovers were united. v. 8. Note the fine irony in this verse. v. 10. "Wandering packs of Buddhists," "alarcakkiyar" could also mean "fat Buddhists." "Ruined": "ninai nikkinane," literally, "you took away the chastity of." v. 11. "Supreme Wisdom": "rayanianam," literally, "the knowledge that can be attained when one is 'completely given over to the Lord."

and moon-adorned matted hair!
You who delight in Marukal rich in great scholars of the Veda!
You have taken her noisy bracelets and with them, her well-being.

7
She never fails to cry upon waking,
"Long live my Lord's feet!"
She thinks of you day and night.
You who bear the axe and the sword,
she worships you, Lord of Marukal, why torment her?

Lord of the strong-walled city of Marukal, when Lanka's king lifted the mountain, you bore down with your toe, making him helpless.
You have made this woman, frail as a flower garland, the object of slander.

9
Lord of Marukal
where your immortal devotees live, god who became a ball of fire,
so that the two could not fathom
your flaming hair and feet, you have made this fine young woman faint with suffering.

The ignorant Jains
and the wandering packs of Buddhists go about committing crimes.
O Lord of Marukal, you who hold the fawn in your hand,
you have utterly ruined
the young woman with thick coiled hair.

11
The fame of those who know the song that Nanacampantan, the poet, transformed by supreme wisdom, and meditating on his god's feet, has composed on the Lord of Marukal town, home of men who possess the knowledge of the Lord's grace, will spread over heaven and earth.

5 Five Who Dwell Within

(POEMS 186-193)

186. Appar IV.46 Offiyür (Tiruvoffiyür)

In vain I pampered the body's cage, nurturing evil in my heart.
Like a spoon without a handle,
I can't dip into the ambrosia I seek.
As I think desperate thoughts, like a frog caught in the snake's mouth,
protect and save me,
O King of Orriyūr!

When I board the boat of the mind and strike out with the oars of my wit, when I load my cargo of anger, and row into the deep sea, when, dashing against the rock of lust, the boat capsizes, then, as my reason fails, give me the consciousness that will make me think of you, O King of Orriyūr!

187. Campantar I.50.7 Valivalam

You are my mother and my father.
O Sankara, I want to love you forever.
The heart is willing.
but the five enemies who dwell
in this burdensome body

186, v. 1. This contains proverbial expressions: "kāmpilā mūļai pola" (like a spoon without a handle), and "pāmpin vāyt tērai pola" (like a frog caught in the snake's mouth).

187. "Burdensome," for "āyam āya," "that which is an obligation, a liability" (here brought about by past karma). "Onral oṭṭār" can mean both "they will not allow [me] to unite [with you]" and "they are hostile toward me."

won't let me join you.

I fear there is nothing left for me but the illusion that is the world.

188. Appar IV.97.3 Cattimurgam

As five who have entered this frame full of holes destroy the refuge I have found in you, my heart is whirled about like yoghurt in a churn.
Give me relief, O Father, see, I have come to you for refuge, perfected sage among the gods, Siva-sprout who dwells in holy Cattimurram!

189. Appar IV.69.1 Kövalür Virattam

I am mere offal, a base dog, filthy rogue who clings to this foul body full of holes, unaware of my true refuge.

What shall I, a blind man who can't see the light, grasp for support?

What shall I do,

O Lord of Kōvalūr Vīraṭṭam's shrine?

190. Campantar II.215 Ārūr (Tiruvārūr)

There are fools who fail to think of Siva's feet even when the breath is failing, the mouth dries up, and the tongue will not stir, even when they are dying men sustained by fluids alone. Like them, you have disgraced yourself, O heart! Yet do not be afraid, faint from the world's illusion, for you will be saved if you worship Ārūr, 188, 189. The body is traditionally described as "the structure with nine orifices." Yoghurt (Poem 188) is churned using a churning stick (mattu) bound with ropes, to yield butter and buttermilk.

190, v. 1. This contains a graphic description of a man on his deathbed.

home of our Lord with the blue throat who loves to ride on the leaping bull.

My father is gone, gone is my mother;
I, too, must die.
Death with his terrible spear
waits to carry me away.
How much longer do you wish to live, poor heart?
Yet do not be afraid,
faint from the world's illusion,
for you will yet be saved
if you worship
cool and beautiful Ārūr.

191. Appar IV.52 Ārūr (Tiruvārūr)

When I consider this vile human life, wasted in filling up the stomach which is like the bottomless pit of the sea, I cry out in pain.

Five fools dwell inside me, driving me to despair—

I, your servant, cannot live with these,

O Lord of the Mūlattam shrine in Ārūr!

There is nothing to hold together this worm-infested frame covered with skin, with nine leaky holes.
Five rogues sit within,
and torment me.
Utterly ruined, I cannot live with them any more,
O Lord of the Mūlaṭṭam shrine in Ārūr!

192. Appar IV.54 Pukalūr

5 Lusting after women with scented hair, I have failed to meditate daily

191, v. 1. Mülattam: The "Mülattānam" or principal shrine in the great temple complex in Tiruvārūr. "Mutuku-": "to drive, hasten, press."
192, v. 7. Pārtha: Arjuna.

on the feet of the Lord who dwells in Kaṭavūr's Vīraṭṭam shrine which rings with joyful song; my unworthy heart reels.
Lord of holy Pukalūr,
What shall I do?

I have failed to subdue the five senses, there is no trace of learning in me.
I don't have the good fortune of being your servant, nor am I pure by speaking truth,
Supreme Lord who blessed Pārtha with your grace,
O holy place of pilgrimage for those who praise you,
Lord of Tiruppukalūr resplendent with pools!

I have lighted a lamp inside my body, and pushed the wick up, to make it burn bright.
Grasping a means to release, I try to rise, but the five whom you have placed within me to bar the way, have proved stronger by far.
Lord of holy Pukalūr, what shall I do?

193. Appar IV.103.1 Āriār (Tirnivāriār)

O devotees who pass your time in useless talk of worldly things and in the care of this despicable frame, in multiplying your karma, in fattening the belly, in getting entangled in family affairs! Be saved! Smear the sacred ash on yourselves, become faithful devotees at the shade of the feet of the Lord who dwells in Ārūr of lotus ponds!

6 Acts of Devotion

(POEMS 194-212)

194. Appar IV.81.5 Köyil (Tillai)

Treasure our human birth as a blessing,
O dear devotees of him who blessed Arjuna with the Pāśupata shaft!
Have we not been born to serve him,
to be possessed
by the dancer of Tillai's Ampalam hall, who once set the three citadels aflame with his arrow?

Worship the Lord!

195. Campantar II.176 Piramapuram (Cīrkāļi)

I beg you, good heart, if you seek release, think only of my Lord's holy feet. Mouth, always sing the good fame of the sweet ambrosia of Piramapuram where wild geese live. Eyes, always look upon the Lord alone, that he might show you his grace.

O mind, offer fresh flowers only to the majestic holy feet of the King who helps us overcome the fear of death.
Tongue, keeping daily the good ritual path, speak the praise
of the fire-hued god who lives in Piramapuram of groves full of honey.

196. Campantar II.177.3 Caykkațu

Good heart, think of the Lord every day. Who knows the course of life and death? If for my Lord of Cāykkāţu alone will my head daily bear flowers, my ear hear his great name, and tongue praise him in song, good karma will surely be mine.

197. Appar IV.9 Tiruvankamålai (The Holy Garland of the Organs of Sense)

7
Hands, join in worship, strew fragrant flowers
on the Lord who binds
the hooded snake around his waist!
Hands, join in worship!

8
Of what use is the body that never walked around the temple of Śiva, offering him flowers in the worship rite?
Of what use is this body?

198. Appar IV.20 Ārier (Tirswārier)

O Father, you dwell in Tiruvārūr, abounding in sacred waters in which the whole world joyfully gathers to bathe, knowing: "To worship the Lord's feet with love is to get rid of karma," and where women eager for water-play swim and dive, and splash about, and wash their hair.

Ayan of the lotus flower seat and the slayer of Iraniyan sought in vain to see the King of Tiruvarur in his flaming form.

I sought and found him when I entered the hearts of his devotees who worship and praise him, and sing his ritual hymns.

Invoke the Lord!

199. Campantar 1.86,7 Nallür

The men who never leave Nallür, who lift up their hands in worship, crying, "Possess me!" those whose hearts rest in the shade of the feet of our Lord whom the Himalayan gods praise as their king, will no longer be perplexed.

200. Campantar I.89.3 Erukkattampuliyür

Karma cannot touch those who can cry, "Lord of the gods! God, bull rider, madman who is man, woman, and in-between, moon-crowned god, our King who lives in Erukkatampuliyūr's shrine, which we revere!"

Dance, Weep, Sing!

201. Campantar I.35.3 Vīļimiļalai

The devotees who know how to weep, to dance and sing and rise, and again fall at the father's feet, to worship Vilimilalai they are worthy servants of the Lord.

202. Cuntarar VII.22.3 Paļamaņņippaṭikkarai

Dance, lovers of Śiva, become devotees of the Lord, crown yourselves with dust from his feet! Give up worldly life, end your suffering, O devotees, gather together, go straight to Palamaṇṇippaṭikkarai, and sing of the place!

203. Appar V.135.8 Innampar

Our Lord of Innampar keeps account of those who worship him with flowers and praise, and weep for love of him, and cry out in their love, as well as those who waste their days unaware of him.

204. Appar V.177.8 Kurankāțuturai

O devotees who have joined our group out of love, dance, weep, worship him, sing his feet, gather at Kurankāţuturai, place of our Lord!

Pilgrims and Servants

205. Appar V.162 Kaccı Êkampanı

3
Let us hasten to make a proper pilgrimage, to offer worship at Ekampam in Kacci of flowering groves, abode of the Lord with the dark throat, the eight-armed, three-eyed god, chanter of the Veda, first among the gods.

If you do not wish the unfortunate fate of the Buddhists, and those of the Jain faith, praise with feeling Ekampam in Kacci, place of the Lord whose beautiful feet are worshipped with flowers.

7
Before old age and disease overcome us, let us be saved, seeking as refuge Ekampam with fragrant groves, saving shrine of our God who is the Lord of the splendid immortals.

206. Appar V.209 Ilińkapurāņak kuruntokai (The Kuruntokai Poem of the Manifestation in the Lińga)

1
They did not seek and enter his abodes, or joyfully pluck flowers for his worship.
The two tried to see the beautiful flame-hued Lord in their pride.

2
They did not attain wisdom, bathing him in flower-scented water,
or walk around his shrine,
wearing the sacred dot on the forehead.
The two sought to follow the blazing Lord of the Universe in his flight.

3
They did not sweep and wash his temple yards clean, they did not carry baskets of flowers for the rites.
The two sought to find the form

206. In this hymn Appar uses the myth of the humbling of Visnu and Brahma to suggest that true devotion alone will help one obtain the vision and experience of the Lord. v. 3. "Protector": "kāppuk koļļi," "guardian." Kāppu (protection) can also denote the hero's band or anklet. In the Tamil Śaiva tradition, kāppu often specifically refers to the sacred ash (as the devotee's protection). v. 7. Appar refers to the practice of ascetics of certain Śaiva sects—such as the Pāśupatas—of carrying the axe, the skull, and other attributes of Śiva.

of the skullbearing Lord, our protector, in pursuit.

They did not meditate on him, bathing him in milk and ghee, they did not praise him without falsehood and deceit. The two tried to behold the fiery-hued Lord in his true form,

They did not weave garlands with erukku buds, they did not proudly wear the loincloth. In sheer arrogance, the two tried to approach very near, and behold the Lord with the matted hair.

They did not climb trees to gather flowers for him, or meditate on him,
They did not bear water for his bathing rite.
The two tried to see the wise Lord's blazing form in its full glory.

7
They did not carry the axe or skull bowl, they did not prostrate themselves at his feet. The two toiled hard to reach and to see the scholar-Lord's lovely feet.

They did not shine, wearing the sacred ash, they did not weave garlands of fragrant flowers. The two tried to find the limits of my father's, flame-colored bull rider's, form.

9
They did not pluck and weave the petals of the newly blossomed blue lotus for adorning his feet.
The two tried to measure the Lord who burned Kāma, thief of love.

10
They did not wear the rudrākṣa beads, or carry the skull as begging bowl, they did not resoundingly blow the conch at his worship rite. The two tried to pursue and behold the flame-colored Lord whose form is the universe.

11
The Lord with the flowing matted red hair and holy form, whom the red-eyed god and Brahmä pursued everywhere and could not find, revealed himself in the linga, saying, "I am here."

207. Appar V.213 Pāvanācak kuruntokai (The Kuruntokai Polm That Destroys Sin)

You who wish to be freed from the grip of sin and blame, love the feet of the god who loves to bathe in the five gifts of the cow, think joyfully of them—our savior will join you in grace.

Why bathe in the Ganges or the Kaveri, why make a pilgrimage to Kumari's cool, fragrant beach, why bathe in the ocean's swelling waves? All this is in vain, if you do not think:
"The Lord is everywhere."

Why become a scholar or study the Law, why give away money and food in charity, why learn to add and multiply?
All this is in vain, if you do not say, "He is dear to me."

Why chant the Veda? Why perform sacrifices? Why study the Lawbooks every day, why know the six Vedānga texts? All this is in vain, if you do not love the Lord.

^{207,} v. 2, In this verse "kumari" could be a reference to the river Kumari. See note to Poem 69.

Why rise at dawn and bathe?
Why practice each rite according to the rules?
Why perform sacrifices at great altars of fire?
All this is in vain if you do not say,
"He is my friend."

Why roam in forest and town?
Why practice extreme penance?
Why give up meat, why stare into space?
The Lord's blessing is yours only if you say,
"He is wise."

Why wear strange costumes and roam in packs?
Why wander and suffer, torturing the flesh?
No fruit is yours until you sing
the Dancer who dances in the Ampalam hall.

Why keep fasts, why starve?
Why climb hilltops to sit in penance?
Why make pilgrimages to bathe in holy rivers?
All this is in vain if you do not say:
"He is the eternal Lord."

9
Even if you bathe at a thousand sacred places, if you have no love for Aran, you are nothing but a fool who tries to contain a flowing stream in a leaky pot.

Why torment yourself with all kinds of pious vows? There is no help for you if you will not cling to the foot with the ringing hero's anklet which crushed the frame of the demon who lifted the hill.

208. Appar V.204.9

The Lord with the golden hair who dwells in the hearts of those who melt in loving thoughts of him, laughs at the flowers and water that false men offer at the worship rite, mocking them.

The Devotees of the Lord

209. Campantar II.242.2 Valanculi

My powerful evil karma has been destroyed, now that I keep joyful company with devotees who faithfully serve the Lord who lives in Valañculi, sharing his form with the Goddess who wears flowers in her hair, our God who saved the suppliant gods by devouring the poison spewed by the wide sea.

210. Campantar II.150.3 Venniyür

They are blameless, who praise the ripe fruit, the sage who joins and takes over those who are ripe with love for him, the one Lord of the three worlds, the good God whom good folk worship in Venni, where he sweetly abides.

211. Appar VI.309.10 Tanit tiruttäntakam (The Detached Sacred Täntakam Poem)

Were they to offer me both treasures of Kubera's world, and give me earth and heaven itself to rule, the wealth of decaying mortals would be as nothing to me, when those who gave were not single-minded devotees

209. "Has been destroyed": "vintolintana," literally, "has burst, split, exploded." 211. "Great Lord": "mātēvār," Šiwa as Mahādeva. Appar speaks of "cankanīti" and "patumanīti," the two principal treasures of Kubera, god of wealth. Sanskrit šankha (consh) and padīna (lotus) are code words for extremely high figures (ten million crore and hundred billions, by one reckoning).

of our great Lord.
But the leper with rotting limbs,
the outcaste, even the foul pulaiyan who skins and eats cows, even these men, if they are servants of him who shelters the Ganges in his long hair,
I worship them,
they are gods to me.

212. Campantar II.177.1 Caykkaţu

They will never be reborn,
but will enter the highest state;
they won't lose heart on earth,
they won't suffer from hunger,
nor endure the pain of disease.
Those who know and learn to know the Lord have no use for heaven,
for they belong to the feet of our Lord in Cāykkāţu in Pukār whose long highways are lined with palaces.

7 Singing of Śiva

(POEMS 213-220)

213. Appar IV.103.3 Ārūr (Tiruvārur)

Flowers make ornaments, and so does gold; yet if our Lord who sweetly abides in Ārūr were to desire an ornament for himself, simple heart, let us honor him with the ornament of Tamil song!

214. Campantar III.329.1 Vaikāvūr

The home of the Lord who delights in the songs of the lowliest of his devotees, though stammered out in sobs, though lacking rhyme and meter and quite out of tune, is Vaikā, where coconuts full of sweet water knock down clusters of kamuku fruit, which crush to pulp ripe plantains fallen in the paddyfields.

215. Campantar II.242.1 Valanculi

Great is the merit you have earned, my heart!
That you worship him with words, saying praises and singing songs of love for the chieftain of Valañculi by the eternal Kaveri whose stream is full of pearls, is surely the fruit
of good deeds once done on this dark sea-girt earth.

216. Appar IV.77.3

Devotees who wash the floor at the Lord's temples will gain ten times more merit

214. "Rhyme and meter": "kankof" literally, "the properties of verse." 216. "The inetfable knowledge of the true faith": "collin meynners nanam."

than those who sweep them clean.
For those who weave fresh flower garlands for his worship, pure heaven itself is the reward.
The ineffable knowledge of the true faith will be theirs, who light lamps at his shrines.
And singing hymns for the Lord is the sure path to his boundless grace.

Kataikkappu: The Fruit of Devotion

217. Campantar Il.242.11 Valanculi

Karma will not afflict them, nor will they suffer in this birth or the next, if they love to listen to men who sing, having learned well the words and music of this garland of Tamil verse composed by Nāṇacampantaṇ, brahmin prince from fertile Kāli, in praise of the cure for the cycle of birth, the god who lives in Valañculi with the Goddess as half his self.

218. Campantar l.129.11 Kalumalam

Those who know as the sole guide for their tongue these ten verses that noble Nāṇacampantan, friend of the good, has composed with great affection on the feet of God who lives in Kalumalam's shrine which men of learning worship and praise, will win the Goddess of wealth and rule the whole earth, and be on their way to the three-eyed Lord's feet.

219. Cuntarar VII.43.11 Mutukungam

Let great philosophers and wise men, let the most venerable sages,

219. "Kissed by the . . . Muttaru": "mutti muttāru." The commentator for the Tēvāram Ātiņam edition takes "mutti" to mean "release" (Sanskrit mukti), reading: "the Muttāru that brings release."

end their misery by praising the Lord of Mutukunru's hill kissed by the circling Muttaru river, in these words of the Lord's slave Uran a madman's babble.

220. Campantar II.150.4 Venniyür

What shall I say of those who do not sing
of the Primal Lord,
the sole God and savior of the three worlds,
the Lord who joins and takes over those who love him dearly,
my Father who lives in beautiful Venni?
Poor devils!

220. "En eeyvār": literally, "what can they do?" "Joins": "kalantu." "Takes over": "ārt-tāṇai," from ār-, in the sense of "mingle, pervade, bind."

Mūvar Mutalikaļ: The First Three Saints

There is no creed nobler than Śaivism; there is no God greater than our Śiva.

The four saints composed the beautiful sacred hymns of the Tēvāram and Tīruvācakam, imbued with the true meaning of the four Vedas, for our liberation—

Their holy feet are our life support!

—Caiva Ellappa Nāvalar, Aruṇaik kalampakam

Of the exemplary and eventful lives of the first three saints, so well known in the Tamil Śaiva tradition after the age of the Nāyaṇārs, we catch only a few glimpses in the Tēvāram. Yet these glimpses have the value of illuminating for us the saints' own perspective on certain incidents in their lives that have fired the popular imagination. This section is devoted to poems containing such autobiographical and historical material. The selections are arranged in four subsections, the first three dealing with the lives of Campantar, Appar, and Cuntarar, and the fourth containing verses and hymns in which the three poets refer to other Tamil saints and devotees. Prefatory notes are attached to the first three groups of poems to help place the historical material in the context of the narrative of the saint's life as given in the Periya purāṇam and oral tradition. The anthology concludes with Cuntarar's celebrated Tirut tontat tokai (The List of the Holy Devotees).

1 Campantar: The Blessed Child

(POEMS 221-233)

The Milk of Wisdom

In the closing verses of his hymns, Campantar identifies himself as a Kavuniyan (a brahmin of the Kaundinya gotra) from Cīrkāli. The saint's father and mother are identified in the Periya puranam as Civapatavirutayar and Pakavatiyar, "Totutaiya ceviyan," the opening hymn of the Tevāram (1.1; Poem 221, see also Poem 183) is traditionally associated with Campantar's initiation into poetry and the saintly life. The threeyear-old child followed Civapatavirutayar to the temple; leaving Campantar on the steps leading to the tank or reservoir (kulam) in the temple, the father went down to bathe. Crying "O Father, O Mother!" ("ammaiyë appa"), the child turned toward the vimana of the temple. Suddenly, Siva and the Goddess, riding on the bull, appeared before him. Siva told the Goddess Uma to feed Campantar with milk from her own breast in a golden cup. This was the "milk of wisdom" (ñāṇappāl), and upon drinking it the child became "Nanacampantar" ("He who is related to God through divine knowledge") and "Alutaiya Pillaiyar" ("the Lord's Child"); Campantar had been blessed with the gift of sacred poetry (see illus. 2). Upon returning from his bath, the father saw milk trickling from the child's mouth. Enraged, thinking that someone had fed his child, thus breaking caste taboos against interdining, Civapātavirutayar said to Campantar: "Tell me at once, who fed you? This food might be polluting!" In reply, the child pointed to the temple and spontaneously sang hymn l.1: "He wears a woman's earring in one ear . . ." The father and all who had gathered there witnessed and celebrated the Campantar's divine vision and gift. "The milk of wisdom" incident is commemorated annually at the Cīrkāļi temple. Although there is no reference in I.1 to the events narrated in the Periya puranam, in III.282.2 (Poem 222) Campantar does speak of "divine food in a golden cup," an angry father, and divine grace. (3162 an Lw Anni fan gwar y 221. Campantar I.1.1 Puramapuram (Cirkalu) 41 w Dwin La 6 4 6

He wears a woman's earring on one ear; B16 m w 4 L Ri Au riding on his bull, 4 orin 2 in min 6 win 6 min

Maniq Some Dery is Cherla

crowned with the pure white crescent moon, his body smeared with ash from the burning-ground, he is the thief who stole my heart.

He is the Lord who lives in fine Piramapuram, where he once blessed with his grace Brahmā of the lotus seat who worshipped him.

222. Campantar III.282.2 Kalumalam (Cîrkâli)

When I was rebuked by my angry father, who rejected as a harmful thing the sweet dish of wisdom served in a flowerlike golden cup, the great Lord possessed me.
He is the noble god who wears the golden earring on one ear, and he dwells with the innocent girl in the rich city of Kalumalam.

On the Road

Like Appar, Campantar set out on an extended pilgrimage, in the course of which he received several gifts from Siva, including a pearl palanquin and golden cymbals. In addition to winning gold coins from Siva to aid his father and other devotees, the saint performed miracles of healing the sick and reviving the dead: he cured his Saiva companions of a shivering fever or ague, cured a woman of epilepsy in Paccilacciramam (hymn 1.44) and brought to life the bones of Pumpavai in Mayilappur (Poem 99). Two such miraculous incidents are said to form the background of poems 223 and 224. According to the hagiographers, when Appar and Campantar were halting in Vilimilalai with their entourage, the land was afflicted by famine. Siva of Vīlimilalai came to the aid of his devotees, granting a gold coin every day to each of the saints. Appar and Campantar were able to feed friends with this money. However, the coins Campantar received were "karaikol kācu": old, soiled coins, which were out of circulation. Campantar soon discovered that, unlike Appar's entourage, his friends had to wait a long time for their food, because he had to exchange his coin at a discount (vāci, vattam) every day, while Appar's coin was discount-free. Disheartened at the Lord's discrimination, the saint sang ^{222.} There is a pun in the expression "pôtaiyâr": "like a flower"; "full of knowledge or wisdom (bodha)." "The innocent girl," "pêtai," is the Goddess.

Poem 223, asking Siva to make his own coin discount-free. The second story concerns the miracle of the temple door at Maraikkāṭu. Campantar and Appar traveled together to several great shrines, including the temple in Maraikkāṭu (Vedāraṇyam), so named because of the tradition that the Vedas themselves once worshipped Siva in that place. Upon arriving at the shrine, the two saints and the devotees who accompanied them found that the door of the temple always remained closed, presumably out of deference to the ancient presence of the divine Vedas at Maraikkāṭu. At Campantar's request, Appar sang a hymn (Poem 242), asking Siva to open the door so that his devotees might obtain the vision (darśana) for which they had come. At the end of the visit, Appar turned to Campantar and asked him to cause the "Sacred Closure" (tirukkāppu) of the door with a hymn. Hymn II.173 (Poem 224), Campantar's response, achieved the miracle.

223. Campantar 1.92 Vilimilalai

1 Give us gold coins, make them discount-free! Let there be no blame, O Milalai's blameless Lord!

2 O God, you rule Milalai, town of brahmins! Restore your tainted coin to its proper worth!

224. Campantar II.173.1 Magaikkațu

O young man, you who live in Maraikkāţu surrounded by sweet groves, place where the four Vedas sing your praise and bow to you—I beg you, quickly favor me with your grace! Give me a sign! Kindly shut your temple door!

Victory in Alavay

"The brightest chapter in Sambandar's life is his expedition to Madurai and his reestablishment of Saivism in the Pantiya capital and the reconversion of Kunpandiyan" (Suddhananda Bharati, The Grand Epic of Saivism, p. 141).

The Pāṇṭiya queen Maṅkaiyarkkaraci and the minister Kulacciṛai were devout Śaivas. Grieved at the excesses of the Jain monks in the Paṇṭiya (Pandya) kingdom, and the king's support of the Jains, the queen invited Campantar to come to Ālavāy (Maturai), the Paṇṭiya capital, and drive out the Jains. The monks attempted to set fire to the Nayaṇār's house. Campantar sang: "Make the flame, kindled by the Jains to burn me, turn toward the Pandyan king," and the king was suddenly afflicted by a burning fever. The king's Jain physicians could not help him. In desperation, he agreed to submit to the miraculous healing power of the child-saint and promised to reconvert to Śaivism if Campantar were to succeed in his effort. The Nāyaṇār cured the king with the application of sacred ash to the chanting of his hymn "mantiramāvatu nīṛu."

When the angry Jains challenged Campantar to compete with them in religious debate, the saint was undaunted, and he reassured Queen Mankaiyarkkaraci regarding his capability. Campantar had to face the Jain challenge in many ways. The monks first tested the power of the saint's hymns by casting the hymns into fire (analvātam) and then into water (punalvātam); in both cases the palm-leaf manuscripts emerged unscathed. In Poem 231 Campantar refers to this incident. Though there is no clear allusion to physical deformity in hymn III.312.1, the verb ônkuka ("rise tall, prosper," in "vēntanum õnkuka" ("may the king rise in fame [lit., 'rise tall']!") is interpreted as a reference to yet another miracle, in which Campantar transformed the "hunchback" Pantiya king (Künpāntiyan) into "Ninracīr Netumāran" ("King Māran who stood tall"). There is no evidence in Campantar's hymns to support the popular stories, recorded in the biographical poems of Nampi Antar Nampi, the Periya purānam, and Tiruvilaiyātar purānam, of Campantar's Jain opponents being impaled on stakes as punishment for their persecution of the saint. Nevertheless, the fact that the saint reserves the tenth verse in his hymns for invective directed toward the Jains speaks for the importance of the Jain controversy in Campantar's life.

225. Campantar III.378 Alavāy (Maturai)

This is Alavay, where the Lord of the host of spirits, flame-red god, dwells with the goddess Ańkayarkaṇṇi, and gives us the Vedas and every kind of wealth.

225, v. 1. Ankayarkanni: the goddess Minākṣī, "Goddess who has cool eyes shaped like the kayal fish." v. 3. The queen is portrayed as engaging in playing ball, one of the favorite sports of young women and girls. v. 4. "The river": anariku, a celestial damsel; here, the river Ganges. "Honors": "appreciates virtues" (kuṇan koṭu). The "strands of pearls" on the queen's breast (v. 7) is a fine local touch. The Pandyan (Pantiya) kingdom was famous for its pearl fisheries, and the Pandyan monarchs always wore pearls.

This is Ålavåy, where he is sung and worshipped every day by Maňkaiyarkkaraci, lotus-lady, Pandyan queen and princess of the Cōla clan, virtuous woman with striped bracelets on her arms.

This is Ālavāy,
abode of the god who rides on the white bull,
chief of the immortals,
Śiva who fully reveals himself to those who have utterly renounced worldly life,
This is Ālavāy,
where he is praised with loving devotion by Kulaccirai, the king's minister who wears the white ash, and willingly falls at the feet of Śiva's devotees.

This is Alavay, renowned shrine of the Lord with the matted hair adorned by beautiful pearls, the snake, and the river, the flowers of the mattam, cool erukkam, and vanni, and the evening moon.

This is Alavay, where he is worshipped by the Pandyan queen with coral-red lips and eyes like the carp, who always wears Siva's sacred ash and plays with a ball.

This is Alavay shrine, abode of the Lord whose matted hair is adorned by the fragrant konrai, the moon, and the cruel snake, the river, and the garland of vanni and pretty kūviļam. This is the rich temple with tall towers, place of worship for Kulaccirai, who honors and serves Śiva's devotees, whether they come alone or in pilgrim bands.

This is Alavay, abode of Uma's lover, the Lord who bears the bright axe and the blazing trident, along with the noose and goad and the fawn.

This is the shrine where he is sweetly praised and worshipped every day by the Pandyan queen, majestic beauty, like a wild goose on a red lotus, well-adorned lady with the lovely brow and mound of Venus like a cobra's hood.

This is Alavay, place of the Lord who bears the trident and the deer, black-throated god whose cloak is the elephant hide, of him who has the rippling river in his matted hair. This is the shrine where he is praised by pious Kulaccirai as all that is good and evil, the Master and the homeless one, the householder who has no family of his own.

This is Alavay,
where our Father dwells with Uma, like a clear crystal hill joined with a brilliant emerald.
This is the shrine
where he is worshipped with proper rites
by the devout Pandyan queen,
on whose breast graced by strands of pearls,
the sacred ash mingles with sandal paste.

This is Alavay, abode of the matted-haired Lord
who won as his devotee the arrogant Rāvaṇa, having crushed his twenty strong arms.
This is the shrine where Kulaccirai worships, who honors all who virtuously chant
the five sacred syllables that are the ornament of the tongue, and wear the pious emblems of the loincloth and sacred ash.

9
This is Alavay,
abode of Uma's Lord who rose in space
so that the two gods, flying up and down, could not measure him.

This is the shrine where the Pandyan queen with voice sweet as pan music, daughter of the golden-crowned Cöla king who is sovereign lord of the whole earth, worships Siva with the proper rites.

This is Ålaväy,
abode of the Lord of the Universe, who is beyond the deluded doctrines of the base Buddhist monks.
This is the shrine
where devout Kulaccirai worships every day, delighting in the praise heaped on the Lord's glory
by devotees who come from everywhere.

They will reign in bliss, praised by the Himalayan gods, who can sweetly sing these Tamil verses of Nāṇacampantaṇ of stone-walled Kāli, praising in Ālavāy the holy feet of Ālavāy's Lord, adorned by the adoration of virtuous Kulaccirai and the Pandyan queen.

226. Campantar III.309 Ālavāy (Maturai)

I Save me,
O Red Lord who lives in holy Ālavāy!
Make the flame
kindled by the false Jains to burn me, slowly consume the Pandyan king instead.

3
Save me,
O Cokkan of Ālavāy
who destroyed Dakṣa's sacrifice!
Make the flame
kindled by the crooked Jains to burn me, turn toward the Pandyan king instead.

226, v. 3. Cokkan: "the Seductive Lord" (Cokkanātar), Tamil counterpart of Sundaresvara ("the Beautiful Lord"), the name of Siva in the Maturai temple. They will own the blameless treasure, who can recite the ten verses Nanacampantan sang to direct the flame toward the Pandyan king, pleasing the world by the grace of the Father, the Primal Being in Ålaväy.

227. Campantar II.202 TIKUNİRRUP PATIKAM (THE HYMN OF THE SACRED ASH) Alavây

The sacred ash is our mantra, the ash covers the bodies of the gods; the sacred ash is all beautiful things, the ash is all that is praised.

The sacred ash is the tantra text, the ash is the core of our faith.

The sacred ash belongs to the Lord of Alavay, spouse of Uma of the red lips.

They are pious men,
who can sing the ten verses which Nāṇacampantaṇ, prince of Pukali, sang in praise of the sacred ash of Alavāy's Lord who rides on the mighty, warlike bull, to cure the southern king of his burning disease.

228. Campantar III.297 Alavāy

Doe-eyed lady, great Pandyan queen, listen!
Do not fear for my safety, thinking me a child, barely weaned.

227, v. 1. "The tantra text": the Agama. As in Poem 118 ("mantiramum tantiramum maruntum āki"), in this context mantra and tantra also refer to the magical formulae and rites used by folk healers. The implication is that the ash is the most powerful mantra of all, and it is indeed used as a healing agent. "Faith": camayam, "religion." v. 2. "Southern king": "tennan," a title of the Pandyan king.

228, v. 1. "Elephant": Āṇaimalai, a hill near Maturai, a stronghold of the Jains in Campantar's time. v. 2. Prakrit: pākatam; the various Middle Indo-Āryan dialects used by the Jains. The Śaivas looked down upon the Jains for using these "corrupt" languages in their religious writings and discourse. The contempt for Jain names (v. 4) expresses a similar prejudice.

With Aran of Alavay by my side, I will easily defeat those scoundrels who practice many torturous rites, living on Elephant and other hills!

With Aran of Álavay by my side,
I will easily defeat those filthy Jain monks who wander like elephants in rut, and eat their food standing, embarrassing pious men,
and mutilate the good Sanskrit of the Ágama and mantra texts, loudly declaiming in the corrupt Prakrit tongue.

With Aran of Ålavāy by my side,
I will easily defeat
those blind fools with names like Candusena, Indusena, Dharmasena, dark Kandusena, and Kanakasena, who roam about like apes, and know neither good Tamil nor the Sanskrit language.

There is no misery for those who can chant these ten verses well composed by the Tamil poet Nanacampantan, prince of glorious Pukali, in the court of the Pandyan king with the glittering crown, proclaiming, "Since Cokkan of holy Alavay dwells within me, I will easily defeat those Jain rogues!"

229. Campantar III.305 Ālavāy

1
Three-eyed god who flayed the wild elephant and put on the hide,
is it your gracious will
that I should defeat in debate
the Jain rogues who offer no sacrifice?

229, v. 11. "Dishonor": "pali," blame; the dishonor of being souls bound by karma.

4 Primal Lord, O god in holy Ålaväy, for the sake of justice, will you favor me with your grace, so that I may defeat in debate the evil Jains who do not study the sacred texts?

5
O world-renowned god,
you who live in holy Alavay crowded with devotees who worship you, tell me, will you favor me with your grace,
so that I may steadily defeat in debate
the Jain monks who eat out of their bands?

Axe-bearing youth in holy Alavay with softly murmuring streams, will you favor me with your grace, so that I may destroy the destructive Jains who gather beached fish from salt marshes by the sea?

If you want to put an end to dishonor say the words of true Nāṇacampantaṇ who cries, in rhythmic Tamil verse, "O god of holy Ālavāy which rings with Tamil song!" to blot out the stain of the wicked Jains.

230. Campantar III.366 Ālavāy

I God who shares his body with the Goddess, Primal Being who dwells in southern Alavāy, may your glory reign supreme in the world! Is it your gracious will, that I should defeat in debate, and destroy, the indecent Jain monks who slander the Vedic sacrifice?

230, v. 3. Unlike the Buddhist monks who shaved their heads, the Jain ascetics plucked out the hair in handfuls, v. 11. "Emaciated": "vāṭalmēṇi," "with bodies emaciated from starvation." "Kūṭal" or "Nāṇmāṭakkūṭal" is another name for the city of Maturai.

3
Lord who holds the fawn and the axe,
Primal Being who dwells in southern Âlavāy!
May your glory reign supreme in the world!
Is it your gracious will,
that I should annihilate in debate
those great sinners who neglect the Vedic rite and wear mats as robes,
the base men who pluck the hair from their heads?

11
They are blessed, who can sing this hymn composed by Campantan of Kāli, city of great towers, to torture the emaciated Jains, when he had left the court of Kūṭal Ālavāy's king.

231. Campantar III.345 Naļļāgu

Cast into the bright flames
the holy name of Nallāru's Lord whose body is cool and gleaming from embracing the beautiful, cool, lustrous breasts of the mountain's daughter, woman who glows with the loveliness of a young sprout!
It will emerge unharmed—
This is the truth!

They will become pure souls free of sorrow, who know these ten true verses that Nāṇacampantaṇ, of Kalumalam town—where the Lord who is our good recourse dwells, embracing the beautiful breasts of the young woman with the slender waist—recited in the court of the king when his verses were cast into the flames.

231, v. 11. "True verses": "correr" can mean either "the truth in words," or "a sequence of verses." "Our good recourse": "narriram," "the good path or course (to release)."

232. Campantar III.312.1 TIRUPPÁCURAM (THE HYMN OF BLESSING)

Long live brahmins!
May the gods and cows flourish!
May cool rain fall!
May the king rise in fame!
May evil things perish!
May Śiva's name prevail!
May the whole world be freed from suffering!

Divine Marriage

Campantar's union with Siva was effected in as miraculous a manner as the rest of his dealings with his Lord. In spite of Campantar's reluctance, the parents arranged a marriage for the sixteen-year-old saint with the daughter of Nampāṇṭār Nampi, a friend of Civapātavirutayar. The wedding ceremony commenced with great pomp in the town of Nallūrp Perumaṇam, where thousands of devotees of Siva and Campantar had gathered for the event. As soon as the ceremony was completed, Campantar sang his final hymn (Poem 233) in which he begged the Lord to unite with him and thus liberate him from all earthly ties, including marriage. At these words, a great blaze of light enveloped the saint and his wife. At Campantar's command the entire assembly entered this flame and thus joined the saint in his final beatific union with his God. Campantar's "divine wedding" is commemorated annually at the temple in Nallūrp Perumaṇam.

233. Campantar III.383.1 Nallurp Perumanam

Not for me is the wedding rite in which the bride mounts the stone.

232. The first verse of this hymn of blessing (p.ieuram) contains a formulaic benediction, in which the poet blesses brahmins, cows, and the king, and prays for rain. According to the traditional legend, when the Jains cast the manuscript that contained their heretical doctrine ("atti nătti," "[God] is and is not") into the Vaikai River, it floated away. By contrast, this hymn, which Campantar composed on the spot and cast into the river, floated against the current and survived the ordeal. Cêkkilar gives a detailed exposition of the meaning of all the verses in this patikam in Perrya puranam 2720 ff. (edition with the commentary of C.K.S. Mutaliyār).

233. Nallurp Perumanam, now known as Achālpuram, is the venue of the annual celebration of Campantar's wedding and union with Siva in the month of Vaikaci. The ceremony in which the bride places one foot on the grinding stone and swears fidelity to her husband (ummi mitittal) is an ancient rite that continues to form part of Tamil weddings.

I have sung many hymns in many towns, from Kalumalam on. Have they not yielded their truth, O god who is crowned with the fragrant flowers of my words, O Master who dwells in Nallurp Perumaṇam, home of your devotees?

2 Appar: The Reformed Monk

(POEMS 234-245)

Affliction and Reform

Tirunāvukkaracar (Appar; see illus. 3) was born Marunikkiyār in Tiruvāmūr, near the holy shrine of Tiruvatikai (Atikai) Vīrattānam, to the Vellala Pukalanar and his wife Matiniyar. Marunikkiyar's sister Tilakavatiyar (Tilakavati) was betrothed to Kalippakai, one of the sixty-three Navanars. When Kalippakai died in battle, Tilakavati devoted her life to Saiva piety, while Marunikkiyar, in search of a fulfilling personal religion. turned to Jainism. He became a respected Jain monk in the Digambara sect, took the name Tarumacenar (Dharmasena), and soon became head of the Jain monastery in Tiruppâtirippuliyūr. Tarumacēnar began to suffer from acute colitis; though he tried many remedies, he could find no cure for the intense pain that racked his stomach. Meanwhile, Tilakavati prayed to Siva, Lord of Atikai, to cure her brother and to bring him back to the true faith. Impelled by her devotion and Siva's grace, Tarumacenar returned to Tiruvamur, where Tilakavati gave him the healing sacred ash (tirunīru) and the five-syllable mantra "namaccivāya." She then took him to the temple at Atikai, where Tarumacenar burst into song, composing the hymn "kūrrāyinavāru" (IV.1; Poem 234). Upon singing the second verse, the monk was miraculously cured, and at the end of the hymn the Lord's voice was heard declaring: "I name you Tirunavukkaracar (Sanskrit, Vāgīśa), King of Speech!" Nāvukkaracar, later called "Appar" ("father") by Campantar, dwelt for a long time in Atikai Vîraţţāṇam, devoting himself to Saiva worship and piety.

The other hymns in this group are typical of the songs in which Appar repents his life as a Jain and celebrates his transformation.

234. Appar IV.1 Atikai Vīraţţănam

1
You won't cure my deadly disease. The ingular sunny solais for just a solais of I do not know what evil deeds I have done. Solais un solais of s

234. The commentators do not agree on the interpretation of verse 5 of this hymn. According to M. S. Manikkavacaka Mutaliyar (Tevaram Atinam edition), the guardian who

O bull rider, I cling to your feet The Digital Digital Digital Congression of the Congres

I made my heart your abode, and the work of the suns o afflicted me with disease of item as punishment for my ignorance. Item as punishment for my ignorance for my ig

I spurned the good protection of those who cared for me, turning instead to the man who stood on the shore. Since he has pushed me into deep water, telling me to find my own way.

[&]quot;cared" for Appar is his sister Tilakavatiyar, and the man or men on the shore ("karai minat ar") represent,s' the Jains who converted Appar to their religion. C.K.S. Mutaliyar commentary on Periya puranam 1335's suggests that the guardian and the man on the shore are one and the same person. In verse 7, it is best to take "uyarnten manaivälkkai" as meaning "I renounced [transcended] worldly life [with none but you for my master]"; this is in keeping with the tradition that Appar was a Jain monk before his conversion. The alternative is to take the phrase as meaning, "I took pride in worldly life . . . because I had no master to guide me."

I have found no safe haven, can't swim ashore.
I have never heard of such a thing, and my bowels writhe in pain,
O Lord who dwells in the Keţila Vīraţţāṇam shrine in Atikai with the sounding river!

I have never failed to worship you how in a white with flowers and incense and water, and between the consideration in a dead man's skull, how in the consumes my flesh—

I suffer, O Lord who dwells in Atikai's Ketila Virattanam shrine!

cius Augiene

I rose above worldly life, above household and riches, but had no master to guide me.
You have possessed me now, I have become your good servant.
Yet you will not cure the painful disease that afflicts me.
I am terrified, I faint, as my bowels are twisted and ravaged by pain,
O Lord who dwalls in Atikai's Kețila Vīraţtāṇam shrine!

O god with a body that glitters like gold, Lord with the matted red hair and slender crescent moon!
You won't put an end to my troubles, to my anguish, and my disease.
If this is how you reward your devotees, how will men like me ever know you?
Your love is my only hope,
O Lord who dwells in Atikai's Keṭila Vīraṭṭāṇam shrine!

n6551 |

njagadi!

1 monai

You cloak yourself in the elephant's flayed hide, and dance on the burning-ground.

Don't you remember granting grace to the haughty demon after you had crushed him under the high hill? I faint, I writhe in pain, I fall, I rise—banish my pain, O Lord who dwells in the Keţila Vīraţţāṇam shrine in Atikai with the sounding river!

235. Appar IV.39 Tiruvaiyaru

O god who pierced the delusion that afflicted me when I joined the Jains and became a wicked monk!
O bright flame, celestial being who stands as the pure path, bull among the immortals, honey who dwells in Tiruvaiyāru! I wander as your servant, worshipping and singing your feet.

2 Calling it a great penance, everyday I carried the peacock-feather fan under my arm; a fool, I was whirled about like the great bar of a loom; but now that I rejoice in the company of my honey who dwells in Tiruvaiyāru praised and adored by Vāli, my heart swells in beauty.

235. In this hymn Appar criticizes some of the practices of the Jain monks: the "yellowing teeth" of verse 4 are attributed to the monks' practice of not brushing their teeth. In verse 2 Appar refers to the local tradition that Vali, the monkey-king who was killed by Rāma in the Rāmayana, worshipped Siva at Tiruvaiyāru. v. 5. "False vows": C.K.S. Mutaliyār (Pernya puranam commentary) takes "ratukkal" to mean "men of bad character," instead of "heresies" or "talse practices." Mānikkavācaka Mutaliyār (Tevaram Ātīṇam edition) interprets "pallurai" in verse " as referring to the Jain doctrine of relative pluralism (anekāntatada, which gives rise to the Jain style of relativistic argument (syādvāda), in which propositions are shown to be valid only when they can assert the simultaneous truth of seemingly contradictory ideas.

3
O mind who made me cling to the Jains who carry mats around, considering it a great penance—
what shall I do with you?
O heart who cleaves to my honey who dwells in Tiruvaiyāru with its lotus pond,
I love you!

I don't know how to get rid of the heart that loved the weak and filthy Jains with their yellowing teeth.
Those who know
how to worship with fragrant offerings my honey who dwells in holy Aiyāru which the whole world praises will put a stop to karma.

Fool heart, why did you torture yourself with false vows, thinking it a great penance to smear the body with bitter powders? Go to the honey who dwells in Tiruvaiyāru where the vāļai fish leap in pools, and meditate on him—
That is the true ascetic vow.

When I think of the long years spent in following the contradictory teachings of the Jains, I feel faint.

When I think day and night of the honey who dwells in holy Aiyāru, town of jasmine groves, I am filled with sweet delight.

236. Appar IV.102 Ārūr (Tiruvārūr Mūlaṭṭāṇam)

1 Pursued by packs of Jain monks, powerful rogues, will I ever have the good fortune

236. The "Lord-who-dwells-in-the-anthill" in verse 2 is Vanmikanatar, the name by of becoming the devotee of devotees who come weeping for love, to the holy Mülattāṇam shripe of him of the beautiful feet adorned by ringing anklets, Siva of the shining matted hair, who lives in Ārūr, town of cool rippling streams?

Will I who committed many crimes, taking for truth the doctrines of those wandering monks, the naked Jains who fast by night, ever have the good fortune of becoming the devotee of devotees who serve Tiruvārūr's Lord-who-dwells-in-the-anthill, who once became a hunter and defeated Arjuna in combat with his bow?

Pursued by wicked monks who eat in barbaric ways, will I ever have the good fortune of becoming the devotee
of devotees who serve the feet of the Lord who destroyed the citadels with his fiery bow of war,
of him who rides the mighty, red-eyed bull,
the deity of Tiruvārūr's holy Mūlaṭṭāṇam shrine, who holds the unattainable treasure?

Will I, who have left the heartless, filthy, shaven-headed monks, and seek to expiate my sins by thinking of Isa alone, ever have the good fortune of becoming the devotee of the lordly devotees who contemplate the Lord, and perform the worship rite for the shining deity of Ārūr's holy Mūlaṭṭāṇam shrine?

which the central lings in the Mülattanam shrine is known. The name derives from the origin legend of the Tiruv arur shrine, v. 5. "Devotees of great austerity": "poruntum tavamutas-" devotees who are very pious and have the accumulated merit of penance (tapas).

Will I, who have left the ways of the naked Jains who eat in silence,
I who repent, and reflect on him,
and call out, "O Hara!"
ever have the good fortune
of becoming the devotee
of devotees of great austerity, who serve the Lord of the holy Mūlaṭṭāṇam shrine
in Ārūr with great, majestic walls?

237. Appar IV.100.1 Kacci Ekampam

You gave me learning; with my learned doctrines, you made me join the Jains, made them try to kill me.
When illness struck, you cured me, freed me from the monks, and graciously united with me to awaken me to the truth.
So—if I fail in your service, you will lash me with a tamarind switch, and kindly punish me,
O Kacci Ekampam's Lord!

238. Appar V.177.6 Ten Kurankatuturai

Once he made me run about with the naked Jains, then made me sing sweet songs for his golden feet.
Kurańkāṭuturai's Lord saved me from karma, and joined me with his true devotees.

Metaphors for Fruitless Labor

239. Appar IV.5 Tiruvārūr

I thought I could be saved without worshipping the feet

239, v. 1. Jain monk's swing: "urt," refers to the swinglike chairs in which Jain monks of the god who covers his body with white ash. I wandered, carried about in a Jain monk's swing, lost my good heart, failed to worship with joined palms the Lord who dwells in Ārūr where peacocks dance to the cuckoo's song in gardens full of flowers waiting to be gathered. I was a thief who steals sour fruit, leaving the ripe ones on the tree.

He made me a frame of bones, filled it out with skin and flesh, and gave me form.

Ārūr's Lord put an end to my karma, gave me lasting joy, and made my heart a temple, in which he abides with love.

Thus he blessed me, making me his own loving servant.

I, who did not deserve to dwell in his presence, was one who let go of the hare to run after a crow.

Once I multiplied sin, following the words of scoundrel monks. The Lord of Ārūr melted my heart, casting out the falsehood I had in me. He drew me close and showed me sickness, then cured my disease and became my master. I, who did not deserve to dwell in his presence, was one who rejected the good Law to buy evil instead.

As a wicked, shaven monk I roamed, unabashed at the laughter of women with full breasts. He made even me an object of his love; the Lord of Ārūr bathed me in milk, were carried about. Various Tamil proverbs form the refram in this hymn. Some, like the proverb about milking a barren cow (v. 6), continue to be popular.

showed me his feet, and, as his servants sang sacred songs of praise, blessed me with his pure smile. I, who once failed to know him, was one who sets out to shape a doll out of drops of dew.

I was a deadly snake, dancing to the tunes of evil men.
Filthy, foul-mouthed, I wandered aimlessly, begging for food, eating with both hands, truly a wretch!
The Lord of Ārūr united his golden form with mine, considering me one of his creatures.
I, who failed to let him abide within my self, was a fool who gets punished for the clever man's misdeeds.

As a Jain monk I wandered, head shaven, studying worldly texts. To me he taught the incomparable doctrine, entered my heart, and there revealed the Truth. I, who never thought of the Lord of Ārūr who is dear ambrosia to his servants whenever they think of him, was one who grows weary, milking a barren cow in a dark room.

Not knowing the true path, shaven-headed and red-eyed, eating out of my hands, I wandered through long streets of towns, unashamed at the laughter of all who saw me, till he gave me discrimination. I, who did not have the good fortune of drinking with my lips the honey that wells up in Ārūr, the Lord who brought me to my wits, was witless indeed.

like one who puts aside the oil lamp to warm himself with a firefly.

A shaven monk, I stood by the words of the base, ignorant Jains.
I was a hypocrite, running away and bolting the door at the sight of lotus-eyed young women. A miserable sinner who did not know the Lord of Ārūr who saved my soul and possessed me, I was one who starves to death, begging for food in a deserted town.

He destroyed the three citadels of the evil demons, the enemy, smashing them with a single arrow; he felled Kāma and Kāla with his eye and foot. I, who did not belong to our dear Lord in Ārūr who is untouched by desire, anger, and pride, was one who takes pride in wasting his time while the path to release awaits him.

He crushed the shoulders and feet and the ten heads of the mighty demon who fiercely challenged him; he cut off one of the heads of the god with the lovely lotus seat. I, who failed to love our dear Lord in Ārūr, the god whose throat is dark from swallowing the deadly poison, was as one who wastes away, gnawing on a bar of iron while sugar cane lies at hand.

Confrontation in Kanchi

The Saiva hagiographers speak of several incidents in which the Jains used their influence on the Pallava king in Kanchipuram to take revenge on Appar for his desertion. Poem 240, in which Appar rejects the glory, authority, and command of the king, was the saint's reply (marumärram) to the minister who presented him with a summons from the Pallava court. In spite of his defiance, Appar was taken to Kanchi and subjected to a number of tortures: he was incarcerated in a lime kiln for a week. given poison, thrown in the path of a raging elephant, and then bound to a heavy rock and cast into the sea. The saint emerged unscathed from all these ordeals. The king's (Mahendravarman's?) faith in Saivism was restored; he reconverted to Saivism and built a temple for Siva near Atikai. Of the many miraculous incidents mentioned above, Appar refers to one alone, that of the rock (Poem 241). Mon ரக்கம் க 4 அவ்வேலம்

240. Appar VI.312 Мавимавват тівит таңтакам (The Taңтакам Роем оғ THE REPLY)

We are slaves to no man, Thoung is to the wiscounce nor do we fear death. The loss of the state of the land of the We rejoice, we are strangers to disease, Loom wolewnie we bow to none. U man Counis Die Counis Joy alone is ours, not sorrow, Doi 1 Colo oring nerio gionalis for we belong forever காமார்க்கும் குடியல்லாக கன்மையான to Sankara, who is the supreme Lord, Oni a god, rish & rish and in our King who wears the white conch earring on one ear, & soy & wing and we have reached கூரின் கோமாற்கே his beautiful, flower-fresh feet. நாவைன்றும் சோர் ஆளாய் கொயம் மவர்சேவடிய கேறுகி குறைமே

The wide world is our home; generous householders in every town give us food.

240. The opening lines of this hymn: "nāmārkkun kuṭiy allòm namaṇaiy añcòm" ("We are slaves to no man, nor do we fear death") not only have become the Tamil Saiva credo but are seen as the manifesto of the Tamil spirit in general. Though many of the references are specific to Appar's life, the use of the first person plural gives the ideas in this hymn a more general application to the Saiva community. In the first three verses, there are echoes of "vatum mure yavarun kelir," the famous classical poem (Purananuru 192) of Kaniyan Punkungan; there are also interesting contrasts between the two poems. See Hart, Poets of the Tanul Anthologies, p. 180. "Pini," translated as "disease" in verse 1, can also mean "bondage." v. 4. "Saiva devotees": "uruttira palkanattinorkal" telets to the many Saiva sects familiar to Appar. v. 6. "Rose-apple land": "navalan turu" (Sanskrit jambuduipa , the name for the "continent" of India in Hindu cosmology, v. 9. "bonds": "pacam," v. 10. The tradition provides varying lists of the "eight attributes" (enkunam) of the Lord as the supreme being; these include infinite bliss, grace, and power. See the commentary of Arunaivativel Mutaliyar on Appar VI.230.4, Tevaram Atinam edition, vol. 6, p. 125.

Public halls are our only shelter; we sleep in Goddess Earth's loving embrace—all this is true.

The Lord of the warlike bull has taken us.

We lack nothing, our trials are over now.

Why need we listen to the words of men who parade themselves in silk and gold?

We are innocent men.

We do not consort with women; we rise before dawn to bathe and chant Mahādeva's name, our sole ornament is the sacred ash.

Tears, welling from our eyes like monsoon rains, proclaim the melting of our stony hearts.

Why need we obey the commands of kings who ride on elephants?

We are free from bonds.

Saiva devotees are our only kin,
we wear nothing but the waistband and the loincloth.
Even our enemies cannot harm us;
all evil is turned into good for us,
and we will never be born again.
Our tongues chant "Hail Śiva!"
good name of the Lord
with the sweet, golden konrai wreath.
We are devotees of the Lord whose blazing forehead eye reduced crocodile-bannered Kāma to ashes.

We will yield to no man;
none on earth can equal us.
We do not follow small gods,
we belong to Lord Śiva's holy feet alone.
Surely we lack nothing!
Deadly disease has fled, leaving us untouched.
We live on the merit of having taken refuge in the good Lord who is crowned with a garland of skulls.

They alone may rule us, whose tongues chant the name of Siva with the holy coral-red form, the Lord whom the thirty-three gods and all beings praise as the first among the three, the eight-formed deity. Even if the king of this entire rose-apple land were to command us, we need not obey—we are not criminals or thieves.

Our sole duty is joyfully to sing the glory of him who manifests himself as the moving and the still, as earth, water, fire, wind, and sky, as the small and the great, as hard to reach, yet easily attained by his lovers, as the highest reality, immeasurably great, as infinite Sadāśiva, as you and me. Why should we parrot the words of devils? We are blameless men.

Every day we meditate only on the Lord, ruler of all the worlds, king of the Himalayan gods, him who blazed up as fire, god who bears the white ash on his red body, good lover of the mountain's beautiful daughter. We have long renounced the doctrines that the Jains, who ear standing, had taught us.

Who are you to us?
And who is your king?

9
The Lord with the matted hair and the conch earring on one ear, with his body adorned by the ash and the snake,
bull rider clad in the tigerskin

and the silver-spotted skin of the deer—
He is the King who rules us, you see!
We are not servants of the king who commands you and all his troops—
We are free from all bonds!

We have the good fortune of singing our Lord to our hearts' content, of repulsing the shameless Jain monks.

The king of immortals, the Lord who graciously rules us, Siva, the god of gods who rose as the flame which Ayan and Māl could not know, dwells in my heart.

If Death himself were to declare his dominion over us and command us to serve him, we would refuse, for the Lord's eight attributes are ours.

241. Appar V.186.7 Nilakkuți

When the Jain rogues bound me to a rock, and swiftly cast me into the sea—it was surely because I chanted with my tongue the good name of Aran of Nīlakkuṭi, where the paddy grows tall in the fields, that I was saved!

From Atikai to Pukalūr

Appar spent his long life traveling to his Lord's shrines. Of particular interest to us here are some of Appar's hymns dedicated to shrines that tradition associates with turning points in the saint's spiritual life. In Tūńkāṇaimāṭam, he asked Śiva to brand him with the emblems of the trident and the bull (Poem 149). The request was granted. From Tūṅkāṇaimāṭam, the saint went to Chidambaram and nearby temples. At Cīrkāli, Appar met Campantar; it was here that the child lovingly addressed the elder saint as his "father" (appar).

^{241.} In this verse "nir" ("water") is traditionally interpreted as referring to the sea. "Was saved": "wynten" signifies release.

Cëkkilar records Nallur, Tinkalur, and Tiruvarur as the next land-marks in Appar's pilgrimage. Appar's request in Tiruvavatuturai (poem 150), that Siva should brand him with his lotus feet, was granted in Nallür. In Tińkalür, the saint brought back to lite Tirunavukkaracu, the son of his fervent devotee Apputi Nayanar; it is worth noting that Apputi had named his son after Appar. Tiruvarur is the setting for Appar's best-known hymns, including what appears to be a firsthand account of the Tiruvatirai festival (Poem 98).

In Poem 242, Appar refers to the door in the temple at Maraikkätu. In the Väymür hymn (Poem 243), he speaks of his travels with Campantar, of the miracle of the gold coin at Vilimilalai, and of the miracle of the temple door at Magaikkāţu (see poems 223 and 224).

In his old age Appar was seized with the longing to visit Mount Kailäsa, the Himalayan abode of Śiva. The elderly saint's journey and ascent were fraught with physical hardship; though overcome with weariness, he persisted in his effort. Śiva appeared to him in a vision and in an instant transported him to the southern shrine of Tiruvaiyāru where, he assured Appar, the saint would see his Lord as he appeared in Kailasa. Appar was plunged into the reservoir in Tiruvaiyāru temple, rose with his wounds healed, and beheld that temple transformed into Kailāsa.

The famous hymn IV.3 (Poem 244), dedicated to Tiruvaiyaru, records an extraordinary experience, a mystical vision in which Appar saw the whole world as Siva in union with the Goddess or female principle, and felt the presence of the Lord's feet in everything around him. The text of the final selection relating to Appar's life (Poem 245) is taken from the hymn considered to be his last. After singing it, the saint finally "reached Siva's feet" in Pukalūr.

242. Appar V.124 Maraikkatu

I
Spouse of Umā of speech sweet as music!
Lord of Maraikkātu, worshipped by the world!
Favor me with your unfailing grace!
Open the door,
let me see you with my eyes!

7 O God who wears the white ash, infinite Lord, god of lovely Maraikkātu!

242. In the Vâymûr hymn (IV.164.8, Poem 243) Appar explicitly says: "My song opened the temple doors." v. 7. "God": "vikirtar." The term literally means "a person whose behavior is changing and inexplicable," "enigmatic person," but is used to refer to the detty.

Kindly open this great door, so that your devotees may worship you!

11
O my Lord who quelled the demon with one toe, have you no pity?
Lord of Magaikkāţu with fragrant punnai groves!
Quickly open this door!

243. Appar V.164 Väymür

Once he sought me out, came to me, and gave me his sign.
The dear Lord of Vāymūr of palm groves now asks me come to him there.
O wonder!

As I lay thinking of the bridegroom in renowned Maraikkāţu, he revealed himself to me as Vāymūr's Lord, then vanished, bidding me come to him there. O wonder!

3
"I have found you,
O refuge for homeless wanderers!" I said.
"Fear not! I came to fetch you," said he.
"I am saved," I cried joyfully, and arose, and hastened here.
It seems my Lord of Vāymūr has played a trick on me.

I saw him with these eyes, and did not see him leave. Never leaving his side, I ran along with him. Yet Vāymūr's Lord has vanished on the road, leaving me caught in the web ^{243,} v ... Appar seems to be referring to the incident of Campantar and the "old coins" (palankācu) in Viļimiļalai.

of his wily tricks.
O wonder!

"My Lord is the only light,"
I thought, and rejoiced.
Yet the Lord of Väymür who once appeared to me as wisdom incarnate, now hides himself like a thief!

As though he would relieve the misery of the devotee whose reward for singing him was an old coin, the Lord ran after me, asking me to come to holy Vāymūr. Now he hides himself.

O wonder!

My song opened the temple doors; the poet who commanded them shut, with more powerful, purer Tamil song than mine, also waits here.
How can this madman of Väymür, with the moon-crowned red hair, hide himself?

When I begged to become his true devotee, the Pure Lord who blesses even false men like me when we think of him, appeared before me, and said: "Follow me to Vāymūr," then vanished into the golden temple by the stream. What false vision is this?

10
With one holy, unapproachable foot he crushed the demon to save him.
When I pray,
"May I coax forth the flame in the lamp of holy Vāymūr!" look—it shines for me!

244. Appar IV.3 Tirunsiyaru

I Singing of the Lord who wears the lovely moon as a wreath on his hair, and the mountain's daughter with him, I followed those who go to his temple carrying flowers and water for worship. When I reached Aiyāru, unwearied, I saw an elephant come with his beloved mate, I saw the Lord's holy feet, I saw what I had never seen before.

Singing of the Lord who wears the crescent moon as a wreath on his hair, and with him the silk-clad Goddess, I danced around the shrine, crying: "Hail! Hail to him!"

When I reached Aiyāru, where Viṣṇu of the wheel worshipped, I saw a cock and hen joyfully mating, I saw his holy feet, I saw what I had never seen before.

Singing of the Lord who wears the bright crescent moon as a wreath on his hair, and with him his Goddess adorned with jewels, I came, smiling for joy, dancing to complex rhythms. When I reached Aiyāru, where the foaming stream eats into its banks, I saw the banded cuckoo come dancing with its mate, I saw his holy feet, I saw what I had never seen before.

Singing of the Lord who wears the crescent moon as a wreath on his hair, and with him the Goddess with speech sweet as honey, I came, crying, "Where will my Lord reveal his grace to me?"

When I reached Aiyāru, where young women dance, I saw a green parrot flying with its mate, I saw his holy feet, I saw what I had never seen before

245. Appar VI.313.1 Pukalur

What shall I think of, other than my Lord's holy feet?
Other than his feet that I worship with joined palms, I have no support; there is nothing else I wish to see! You made nine doors for my frame. When the time comes for them to close, I will lose the power to feel you. Therefore, blessed Lord, I only wish to reach your feet, O good Lord who dwells in Pümpukalür!

245. "I have no support": "kannilen" can also mean "I have no means for seeing {other than Siva}." "Unara matten": "I won't be able to sense/realize cognize you."

3 Cuntarar: The Lord's Comrade

(POEMS 246-258)

In the relatively short span of a hundred hymns, Nampi Ārūrar or Cuntaramurtti provides us with more particulars about his life and times than either of his fellow saints. Like Campantar, Cuntarar mentions details of his personal and public life in his signature verses. From these, and from traditional accounts, we learn that Cuntarar was born in Tirunavalur to the Saiva brahmin (Aticaivar) Cataiyanar and his wife Icaiñaniyar, He grew up in luxury as the adopted son of Naracinka Munaiyaraiyar, a Pallava feudatory prince. The poet calls himself "Arūran," and speaks of himself as the father of the girls Cinkati and Vanappakai, who were given to him by his admirer Kötpuli Nāyanār. Cēkkilār informs us that this saint was named "Ārūrar" or "Nampi Ārūrar" after Siva in Tiruvārūr. The name "Cuntaramurtti," "the handsome lord," is probably connected both to the popular image of the saint as a handsome youth with expensive tastes and to the legend of Cuntarar's being the incarnation of an attendant of Siva in Kailasa called Alalacuntarar. Cuntarar spent the maior portion of his life in Tiruvārūr.

Cuntarar's "autobiographical" hymns can be broadly grouped under four themes: his conversion at Venneynallür; his "Tiruvārūr" period, during which he first married the dancer Paravai, and then Cankili in Tiruvorriyūr, and his blindness and recovery of sight; his negotiations with Siva for wealth and wordly goods; his final ascent to Kailāsa.

Enslavement at Venneynallür

In several hymns Cuntarar speaks of his "conversion" experience at the Aruţturai temple in Venneynallūr, the incident that is said to have been the context of his first hymn, "pittā piraicūṭī" ("O madman with the moon-crowned hair!" VII.1, Poem 246). Campantar's life ended in a divine "wedding"; Cuntarar's saintly career began with an interrupted wedding ceremony. "Taṭuttāṭkoṇṭa purāṇam," the title of the biography of Cuntarar in Cēkkiļār's Periya purāṇam, refers to this incident, in which Śiva first stopped (obstructed, taṭuttu) the wedding, and then took Cuntarar as his servant (āṭkoļ-). When the young man from Nāvalūr (Tirunāvalūr) was about to marty a woman chosen for him by his parents at Puttur, an old man pushed his way through the crowd and rudely demanded that the ceremony be stopped. As the astonished public gathered around him, the old man declared that Cuntarar was the bonded slave of himself and his forefathers, and that the youth would now have to work for his master. Undaunted by the indignant protests of Cuntarar and the guests, the old man produced a palm-leaf manuscript that contained a deed of sale confirming his claim. Calling him a "madman" (pittan), Cuntarar tore up the deed, whereupon the man produced another document that he declared to be the original deed, and led Nampi Arurar to the council of elders at nearby Venneynallur. The elders pronounced the deed to be in order; while the assembly looked on, the "madman of Venneynallūr" vanished into the Arutturai ("Shrine of Grace") temple in that town. Transformed by his mystical encounter, Cuntarar acknowledged his everlasting bondage to the Lord and cried to Siva: "How shall I praise you?" The Lord of Venneynallur named Cuntarar his "Rude (or Aggressive) Devotee" (vanrontan) and commanded him to sing his God as the "pittan" (madman). Inspired, Cuntarar began his first hymn with the words "pittā piraicūtī."

246. Cuntarar VII.1.1 (Tiru-) Venneynallür

O madman with the moon-crowned hair, God of grace, O Lord, how can I forget you? You dwell forever in my heart. In Aruţturai, shrine of grace, in Venneynallür on Pennai's southern bank, you took me for your own—how can I deny you now?

247. Cuntarar VII.62.5 Kölakkā

Once he displayed to the whole world the contract of bondage, cried, "Be my slave!" and hid in Venueynallür.
Bright cluster of pearls, my one path to release, Lord of the gods, the bowman who smashed the lofty, strong citadels with his mountain bow—
I have seen him in Kōlakkā with his soft girl.

248. Cuntarar VII.17 (Tiru-) Navalur

Our holy town of Nāvalūr is the home of the poet who possessed me in Veṇṇeynallūr, the god who set fire to the enemy's three cities with a single, swift arrow, while Viṣṇu, Brahma, and the king of gods obeyed his command.

Our holy town of Návalůr is the home of the good Lord who once graciously took me for his own, who gave as reward for my angry, threatening words in the assembly hall, the name and life of the "Rude Devotee," who showered me with riches, giving gold in return for abuse!

Our holy town of Nāvalūr is the home of the god of the bamboo grove who became my father and my mother, freed me from birth and death, and joined me forever to his golden feet, the Lord, my lover, who took me for his own in Veṇṇeynallūr.

The bonds of karma will be severed for those who love, learn, and listen to the Tamil hymn composed by the scholar and rude devotee Ārūraṇ, praising lovely Nāvalūr as the Lord's town, our town, the town where Naracinka Muṇaiyaraiyaṇ lovingly serves the Lord.

248, v. 1. "Poet": "navalar," orator, v. 2. In his hymns, Cuntarar frequently refers to gold given by the I ord, v. ". "The god of the bamboo grove": "Véyavaŋār" may be a reference to the local legend concerning Siva's concealment in a forest of bamboos, It may also simply mean: "the hunter," as suggested by the use of the epithet "réyativar" (hunter) in verse 8 of this hymn, which has not been included here.

Paravai, Cankili, and Blindness

According to the Tamil Saiva tradition, Cuntarar's double marriage to Paravai and Cańkili was literally "made in heaven." The saint and his two wives had been servants of Siva in Kailasa, and were born on earth to be united in marriage and serve Siva as human devotees. Cuntarar's hymns give us some idea of the complexity of his earthly life with two women, as well as of his love and concern for each.

Cuntarar settled down in the great temple center of Tiruvarūr, where he met and married the lovely temple dancer Paravai (see illus. 4). Together they lived a life of service to Siva's temple and his pilgrim-devotees. On a visit to Tiruvorriyur Cuntarar met and fell in love with the pious Vellala maiden Cankili, whose avocation was to weave floral garlands at the local shrine. The poet wished to marry her and asked Siva to help him approach the girl. The Lord agreed to do so, but in reality he wanted to test Cuntarar's devotion and integrity. He first appeared before Cańkili in a dream, and spoke on Cuntarar's behalf; the girl agreed to marry Cuntarar, but only on the condition that he would promise never to leave her and Tiruvorriyur. When Siva told Cuntarar about Cankili's demand, the pilgrim-poet felt that such a promise would be difficult to keep. He requested Siva to leave the linga at the temple and take temporary residence under the makil tree in the courtyard, leaving him free to take a nonbinding oath in the sanctum. The Lord agreed to Cuntarar's proposal, but went to Cankili and suggested that she insist that Cuntarar should take his oath, not in the shrine, but under the makil tree. The saint was trapped, and took the oath under the tree. Marriage and a happy life with Cankili in Tiruvorriyur followed. However, with the coming of spring. powerful memories of Tiruvärūr—of the Spring festival (vacantorcavam) in Tiruvārūr, the Lord of Tiruvārūr, and the dance and presence of his beloved wife Paravai at the shrine-stirred in Cuntarar. Unable to resist the call of Tiruvārūr, Cuntarar left Cankili and Tiruvorriyūr, and was struck blind on his way to Tiruvārūr.

Cuntarar speaks of his suffering in many hymns. He considers his blindness to be a punishment from Siva for abandoning Cankili, yet he does not think that so harsh a punishment is deserved. He alternately pleads with and reproaches his Lord, and reports that the Lord ultimately forgave him and cured him of his affliction. In the traditional account, Siva responded to the saint's plea in stages, at various shrines where he visited and sang hymns on his way to Tiruvārūr: at Venpākkam Siva gave him a walking stick; at Kanchipuram, restored vision to one eye; and in Tiruvārūr, completely restored sight. Finally, Siva himself interceded—as a tūtan, a go-between—on behalf of his devotee in order to effect a reconciliation between the poet and Paravai in Tiruvārūr. Cuntarar's familiar, teasing relationship with his Lord has earned him the name "tampirān tölar" ("the Lord's Comrade").

249. Cuntarat VII.51 Arier (Tirswärser)

How can I live far away from my God in Ārūr?
How can I bear to be parted from him whose glory was sweetly sung by two before me, the Lord with the forehead eye, the fruit of all learning, the god whom I love with all my heart?

10
I am an ignorant wretch, parted from my God in Ārūr,
from him who is the seven notes of music,
the fruit of my song, my sweet ambrosia,
the dear friend who aided me in my many crimes,
and graciously blessed me with Paravai, my woman with the lovely bright eyes.

250. Cuntarar VII.54 Orriyar (Tiruvorriyar)

Burdened with a foul body, I take refuge in your holy feet—
If this is what I deserve, remember, O Lord!
Men will take milk from the cow

249, v. 9. "Two before me": Campantar and Appar. The commentator Arunaivativel Mutaliyar (Têvāram Ātīņam edition, vol. 7) takes "munniruvar" to mean Brahmā and Viṣṇu, in the context of the myth of Śiva as the flaming pillar. v. 10. "Lovely bright eyes":

"māļai on kaņ" can also mean "eyes curved like the mango."

250. In verse 2 Cuntarar refers to his blindness as the Lord's punishment for breaking his oath to Cankili. v. 4. The meaning of the first two lines is quite obscure. "If . . . it is fair": "kanakkuwalakkükil," "if it is legitimate." Cuntarar's reference to Siva as the "three-eyed god" in verses 4 and 9 is pregnant with irony. v. 9. "Evil planet": "makattir pukkatör caṇi": "Saturn who has entered the house of Makani." In the South Indian astrological tradition, Saturn (Caṇi) is considered to be the "evil" planet; its entrance into the lunar mansion that converges with the karinic pattern of an individual is bound to bring bad luck. v. 10. "Sacred texts": the Vedānga texts.

even if it is mixed with dung.
Sinner though I am, I would never sin against your holy feet.
Even when I slip and tall, I utter nothing but your holy name.
You who dwell in Orrivur, answer me, tell me a cure for blindness!

Born a miserable wretch, I became yours. What shall I tell you? Tell me, what shall I do for the sake of my darling Cankili, O god with the eight glorious torms? Sinner though I am, I would never sin against your holy feet. You who dwell in Orriyur, with all my faults, I am still your slave, I accept all you have done to me!

Your devotees are not related to you by birth or by marriage.
Yet what does it matter?
When they praise you, you reveal yourself to them, you never speak harsh words to them.
O god with the three eyes, you who dwell in Orriyur, if you think it is fair to take away my sight, give me at least a stick for support!

O son, my gem, O bridegroom, you have become my evil planet as well! I can't bear it when my women refuse to listen to me, calling me a blind wretch! How can I live without eyesight, O three-eyed Lord, chanter of the Veda? Is this fair, O god who dwells in Orrivür washed by the cool, swelling waves of the sea?

10
Those who know these ten verses that Uran, the Rude Devotee, chanter of the four Vedas and sacred texts praised by the world, very pious young man, has sung on the dear one who dwells at the shrine in wave-washed Orriyūr, will surely reach the highest state.

251, Cuntarar VII.69 Mullaiväyil

Taking your glorious feet for my blessing and lasting wealth and treasure,
I wander, committing crimes,
insulting other men, true to you alone,
O Lord of holy Mullaiväyil of fragrant groves!
Since I am your singing devotee,
free me from suffering,
O Lord of Souls, Supreme Light!

O brahmin worshipped by the gods, you once flayed the elephant's hide, frightening the Goddess.
O Lord of holy Mullaivāyil of cenpakam groves, King of the gods!
You who dwell in great Orriyūr, town of cool groves, god who blinded me to please Cankili, free me, your devotee, from suffering, O Lord of Souls, Supreme Light!

Who is so fortunate as I, bountiful Lord?
Knowing that you accept
even my deceptions and offenses as good deeds,
I have committed many sins.
O Lord of holy Mullaivāyil who burned the three flying citadels of the arrogant demons,
I, your devotee, have severed all my ties;

251. "Pācupatā," in the refrain of this hymn, literally means "O follower of the Pāsupata cult!" Here it refers to Śiwa as Pasupati, "Lord of Beasts," and "Lord of Souls (pacu)." v. 7. The elaborate description of the charms of women in this verse might have been inspired by Cuntarar's meditations on his love for two women, a love that resulted in his present state of afficults.

free me from suffering,
O Lord of Souls, Supreme Light!

O treasure in holy Mullaivayil with lush groves, town that ceaselessly resounds with the fine dances of dancing girls with long carplike eyes and breasts adorned with jewels, women lovely as peacocks, with coral lips, bright smile, and long, dark hair!
Day and night 1 serve you with devotion; free me from suffering,
O Lord of Souls, Supreme Light!

O Master! O Śambhu who once in Vennevnallur took me for your slave, though I'm no better than a dog! O Lord praised by the gods, god who held the ocean's poison in his throat! Bright gold that I, wandering seeker, tound in holy Mullaiväyil, city of golden palaces, free me, your devotee, from suffering, O Lord of Souls, Supreme Light!

252. Cuntarar VII.89 Venpäkkam

When I cried, "Thinking, 'My Lord forgives his devotees' faults,'
I sinned. Heedless of blame, you have blinded me.
O god with the golden earring on one pendulous ear, are you in the temple now?"
The Lord who bears the fawn replied from within:
"I am here; now go your way!"

2 I make neither the beginning nor end of my acts; the Lord is my sole refuge.
Yet, without thinking,

252, v. 1. "Pendulous ear": "ratikātu." The weight of the carring has elongated the earlobe. This detail is also found in the iconography of Siva and the Goddess, v. 9. Cuntarar's account of the oath taken under the makil tree must surely have been the inspiration for the tale of elaborate trickery that the later tradition has spun out of this incident in the saint's life. "Are you there"—i.e., in the Venköyil shrine.

"This one has sought shelter in me; he is my servant," the bull rider, my Master who has the poisonous snakes, white ash, and tiger-skin robe, replied:
"I am here; now go your way!"

When I cried, "I cannot tell good deeds from bad; your holy feet are my sole refuge.

Though I, your base devotee, should err, should you not forgive?

O god with the hooded cobra, are you there?"

He who could take pity on me and save me with his grace replied:
"I am here; now you go your way!"

When I cried to the Lord with the flaming konrai blossoms on red hair crowned with the Ganges and the cool moon, God who burned Kāma with his powerful forehead eye, "O Lord who blinded me, are you there?" the husband of the Goddess with the bright forehead merely replied:
"I am here; now you go your way!"

When I cried, "O Lord with the golden konrai,
When I asked you to leave the temple and abide under the makil tree, you tricked me, and made me take the oath of fidelity under that very tree.
Are you there, my Lord?"
As if he had just seen his worst enemy,
he replied:
"I am here; now you go your way!"

When I cried, "O Lord of the entire universe!
You who graciously gave me Cankili, lovely as a doe, and blessed me with all the fruits of that gift,
Are you there, inside the Venköyil shrine?"
The Lord gave me a stick for support,
and said:
"I am here; now you go your way!"

3, CUNTARAR: THE LORD'S COMRADE

283. Cuntarar VII.95 Tirmiurur

In everlasting bondage to you, I became your slave, spurning all other masters.

With smouldering fire inside me, pale of face, possessed by you, when I tell you of my pain, you say nothing.

May you live long, my Lord!

2
Sell me, if you wish, for I am not a helpless pawn, but one who willingly became your slave.
Though I have committed no offense, you have made me a blind wretch.
Why did you take away my sight, O Lord?
Now you alone must bear the blame.
Though you won't give me back my eyes,
May you live long, my Lord!

3
You who dwell in Ärür, to whose groves
anzil birds flock every day!
What do you care if your servant,
who tirelessly sings your praise, clinging to you like a calf at the cow's flowing teats, loses his sight, runs into hills,
falls into a pit?
May you live long, my Lord!

Is this Tiruvärür, where the gardens swarm with coral-red beetles?
Is this the reward you give your servants, O Lord? What do you care if your devotee who sings you in rhythmic hymns

253. "May you live long," "Vāļntu pōtīrē," the refrain in this hymn has a tone of bitter sarcasm, driving home the depth of Cuntarar's resentment and despondency. v. 3. Agrīl birds symbolize fidelity in love. v. 5. "Centan pavaļam": "coral-red beetles," after the correntary in the Tēvāram Ātīṇam edition. v. 6. "White storks": Samy, Carika dakkiyattil pullina viļakkam, p. 36, identifies the "cerikāl nārai" of early Tamil literature as the white stork. v. 11. In Pallava sculpture, the Goddess, especially in her form as Durgā, is often depicted with a cloth band across her breasts. The Mūlaṭṭāṇam is the central shrine at the Tiruvārūr temple.

311

loses his sight and comes to you in complaint? May you live long, my Lord!

O Lord whose matted red hair is adorned by a garland of golden konrai from the pastoral lands, you who dwell in Tiruvārūr, where white storks gather, with legs red as millet stalks!

What do you care if your servant wastes away, afflicted by poverty and blindness, and grieves in his heart?

May you live long, my Lord!

You who dwell in Ārūr, where birds flock together in the groves, my Master, is this the reward you give your servants? If the best you can do is to give me a transient birth, and a body, and a heart that will never forget you, and then rob me of my sight, may you live long, my Lord!

O three-eyed Lord who manifests himself in many forms, Lord with eight arms and the poison-darkened throat, you who dwell in the central shrine of Tiruvārūr temple, with your spouse who wears a band across her breasts! As the whole world watched, you took away your devotee Arūran's sight. Now you alone must bear the blame.

May you live long, my Lord!

254. Cuntarar VII.92.8 Pukkoliyür Avınāci

I worship no god other than you.
I am blind,
but if you would give me vision,
it is you that I want to see,
Lord who wears a snake as his waistband,
and lives in Pukkoliyür Avināci,
O god with the stained throat,
you who can make the blind see!

"Gold, and Silk, and a Flashing Sword"

Remarkable among the Tevaram hymns are those of Cuntarar's patikanis in which he asks Siva to provide him not only with spiritual succor but with material goods and luxuries. In the Kohli hymn (VII.20, Poem 225) the poet asks the Lord to send him "men to carry the grain" that he had received in Kuntaiyur; in the hymn dedicated to Nakaikkaronam [VII,46, Poem 256) he asks for such things as gold, silk, good rice with ghee, a fine horse, and a flashing sword-hardly the attributes of a saint! In such poems, Cuntarar makes it clear that he needs these objects in order to provide for his wives and family. According to tradition, the saint's requests were motivated by the philanthropy he practiced with Parayai in Tiruvārūr; he and this magnanimous lady reputedly ted and cared for the hundreds of devotees who came to witness the Lord's testivals at the shrine in Tiruvärür. In addition to grain, Siva blessed the pious couple with gold and other goods. On one occasion the Lord's bounty came in the form of a shower of gold coins, on another, in the form of bricks turned into bars of gold. Besides confirming the traditional image of Cuntaramurtti ("the handsome lord") as a prince and sensualist-he appears in iconography dressed in fine clothes, wearing a crown and garland of flowers, and carrying a sword—the saint's hymns tell us that Cuntarar thought of Siva as his great patron-king, an idea explicitly articulated in Poem 257.

255. Cuntarar VII.20 Köļili

Thinking of you all the time,
I worship you every day.
In Kuṇṭaiyūr I got some grain to keep from starvation
my woman with eyes curved like swords.
I have no servants, my Lord in Kölili,
send me men to carry the grain!

3
You have a woman as half your self;
the Lady Ganga lives on your spreading matted hair;
you know well the problems of supporting two good women.
In Kuntaiyur surrounded by beautiful groves

I got some grain. Primal Lord, God of miracles, send me men to carry the grain!

What can I say? Have you ever been blamed for sharing your body with Umā whose lips are red like the ripe tonṭai fruit? In Kuṇṭaiyūr, full of lush gardens, I got some grain.
Help me in my need!
Send me men to carry the grain!

You who share your self with the Goddess, with Umā who wears the kuravam blossom in her hair! Surely you know that Paravai is faint from hunger! In Kuṇṭaiyūr, town of gardens where the kuravam blooms, I got some grain.

O Lord whose girdle is a snake, send me men to carry the grain!

Lord, I think only of you,
I always sing of you alone.
You who share your body
with the Goddess with the sweet-smelling hair, my Lord in holy Kölili with palaces of pure gold,
for love of me,
send me men to carry the grain!

8
Our Primal Lord who crushed the demon's many arms and heads!
Fair Paravai, whose mound of Venus is like the cobra's spreading hood, is faint from hunger.
In Kuṇṭaiyūr, where monkeys leap in the woods, I got some grain.
Take pity on me, send me men to carry the grain!

10

They will be rid of misery, and will reign in the heavenly world of the gods, who know these ten verses that the poet of holy Nāvalūr, town praised by pious men, has sung to the Lord of Kölili rich in fertile groves, asking him for men to carry his grain.

256, Cuntarar VII.46 Nākaikkāronam

1

You wander begging for alms in many towns, singing hymns, teasing women, practicing your tricks.
You roam about, wearing dead men's bones, riding your bull.
You who conceal your wealth,
won't you take pity on me some day?
Give me strands of pearls, necklaces of diamonds and gems to wear,
give me musk and sandal paste and sweet perfumes,
O Lord who lives in Näkaikkärönam by the sea!

4

You who roam the streets riding on your bull, dishevelled hair streaming, playing on the beautiful viņā, you have useless servants.

Handsome moon-crowned god, it is fitting that you dance in the company of hideous ghosts.

Is it also proper, is it as a form of penance, that you seduce innocent young women with long, coiled hair?

Tell me, when will you give me bars of gold to end all my trials,

O Lord who lives in Nākaikkārōṇam by the sea?

256, v. 7. Cuntarar cites the legend of Siva's gift of gold coins to Appar and Campantar in Vilimilalai as a precedent that justifies his own request. v. 8. "The heaps of gold" probably refers to the gold in the temple treasury in Tiruvarur, out of which Cuntarar demands a third. v. 11. "Addressing as his close friend": "anmayattal," "intimately, with the freedom arising from intimate friendship."

Handsome Lord, you have made me your own slave, I go about serving you.
Yet you wander as you please, insulting people, picking fights, doing repulsive deeds, boasting of worse.
Give me sweet perfumes, fine clothes, and jewels from your store,
O god who, in the ancient miracle, rose as the cosmic flame hard to behold even for the gods who searched for you,
O Lord who lives in Nākaikkārōṇam by the sea!

He came to you boasting of his strength, and lifted the hill where you sat, absorbed in a lover's quarrel, with your sweet-voiced Goddess who wears a silk cloth on her wide, bright mound of Venus, You crushed the glorious king of Lankā, then, hearing him sing your praise in hymns, gave him a chariot and sword.

Once in Vīlimilalai, home of many brahmins, you gave gold coins every day, so that your loving devotees might not starve.

Even thus bless me today,

O Lord who lives in Nākaikkārōṇam by the sea!

Once you took me, promising me a livelihood; now you say nothing to me, you won't do anything for me.

O Lord with the mighty trident, though you are very rich, you won't give anything to me, your old devotee. I want just one of the three bright heaps of gold you showered in lovely Ārūr—
If you won't give it to me,
I won't let you take another step.
So give me a horse to ride, swift as the wind,
O Lord of Nākaikkārōṇam by the sea!

10 Lord who holds the fawn, you took me of your own free will, and promised me great wealth.
You plied me with lies, and went off to Kilvelur's shrine!
Is this fair? If you cared for me, would you cheat me like this?
I want a blazing golden sword, gold flowers,
and silk sash,
and curry and fine rice with ghee to eat
three times a day,
O Lord who lives in Nakaikkaronam by the sea!

O Lord who is the only support for sweet-voiced Cankili and Paravai, and myself, to whom else can we turn?
Help me in my need, for I am your true devotee.
Give me strands of lustrous pearls,
shining silk and flowers,
fine musk and sandal paste!
They will rule in the world of the gods, who know these fine Tamil verses composed by Ārūran, the poet from rich Navalūr, addressing as his close friend
the Lord of Näkaikkärönam by the sea!

257. Cuntarar VII.34 Pukalūr

Do not sing the praise of false men who give nothing to the suppliant, though he flatters, and grovels, and speaks only sweet words!

Poets! Sing our Father in Pukalür, who gives us food and shelter in this life.

Praise him and end your trials, and you will surely be rulers of Siva's world when you reach the other shore!

257, v. 2. Bhîma and Atjuna are two of the five Pandava brothers, heroes of the epic Mahābhārata. Bhîma is an exemplar of physical strength, Arjuna, of skill in arms. Pati is one of the seven great legendary "vallat" (patrons and denots) who supported poets in the Cankam age. In the Puranānūru, a Cankam anthology, there are sevent, poems dedicated to Pāri as the most generous of patrons. See Hatt, Poets of the Tamil Anti of gies, pp. 162-69. Pāri continues to be the proverbial exemplar of generosity in Tamil country. v. 8. "Grain": "e]," literally, "sesame seed."

Though you call the weakling "Bhīma,"
"Mighty Arjuna, matchless archer!"
though you exalt the miser with the title of great Pāri,
they won't give you a penny.
Poets! Sing our auspicious Lord with ash-smeared body in Pukalūr, and you will surely be rulers of the highest heavens of the gods!

Though you praise them, saying
"Master of many lands, O scholar!
O generous host to your kinsmen and friends!"
they will give you nothing.
Poets! Sing our Lord in cool Pukalūr rich in plowed fields where birds sing, and you will surely reign in glory
over the world of the gods!

Though you flatter the weak old man with grey hair and trembling limbs, saying, "O youth with strong shoulders like hills!" you will get nothing from him.

Poets! Sing Pukalür of the blessed Lord who rides on the tall white bull, and you will surely reign as kings in the world of the gods!

Though you praise the wicked man, the great rogue, the sinner, the crooked one, the criminal, and call him a good man, he won't give you a thing.

Poets! Sing Pukalūr of the blessed one with matted red hair that shines like gold, and you will surely be rid of the sorrows of life, and attain release!

Though you flatter the miser who hoards his wealth down to the last grain, and won't give even to the poorest of the poor, though you hail him as your kinsman, your noble patron, you will get nothing from him.

Poets! Sing fine Pukalür, where birds flock together, and you will surely escape being mired in sin!

Those who know these ten verses that the poet Ūran, from Navalur of groves fragrant with flowers, father of Vanappakai, Caṭaiyan's son, the Rude Devotee, has sung of the dear Lord who dwells in southern Pukalūr where fresh lilies bloom in the fields will surely reach our righteous Lord's feet.

Ascent to Kailasa

As with Campantar's hymns, we find few identifiable references in Cuntarar's hymns to the many miracles which he is said to have performed: saving a boy from a crocodile 'in Pukkoliyur Avinaci; quelling the floodtide of the Kaveri in Tiruvaiyaru); overcoming highwaymen in a remote forest inear Tirumurukanpuntis. Nor are Cuntarar's adventures with the Cëra king Cëraman Perumal Navanar (Kalarirrarivar), himselt a poetsaint of the Tamil Saiva canon, recorded in the seventh book of the Tevāram. However, since Cuntarar dedicates a number of hymns to shrines in the Pantiva and Cera regions—two hymns in the latter group are dedicated to the shrine in Ancaikkalam, the ancient Cera capital at Karur or Vanci-it is quite likely that the legends of the saint's celebrated triendship with the Cera monarch and his travels in the Cera land are based on historical fact. Cuntarar's last hymn (VII.100, Poem 258) is concerned with the poet's bodily ascent to Kailasa, Siva's Himalayan abode, mounted on a white elephant sent by Siva. According to the traditional narrative, the Cera king accompanied the poet on horseback. With this striking visionary poem, the final hymn of the Tevaram corpus, we end our brief account of the life of "the Lord's Comrade."

258. Cuntarar VII.100 Tirunotittanmalai

I Knowing him as my maker,
I made many hymns for his golden feet.
O wonder, that the Highest God in Notittānmalai cared for me, though I am no better than a dog, that he separated my soul from flesh, and gave me a glorious elephant on which to rise to heaven, welcomed by all the gods!

Was it to end his enmity with elephants since the day he flayed the elephant-demon's hide, that, as I controlled the vital breaths and remained in steady contemplation of the Shining One, the Highest God in Notittanmalai blessed me with an elephant which the great gods of heaven themselves worshipped and made me mount?

3 I don't know any sacred chants; delighting in the householder's life,

258, "Notitranmalai," "Hill of him who crushed [the demon]," is said to be one of the Tamil names of Mount Kailasa. v. 1. "Separated my soul from flesh": some commentators interpret "unuyir veru ceytan" as meaning "made the soul reach transcendence in the flesh" (nvanmukti). v. 2. Cuntarar describes the yogic technique by which the devotee sees Siva within himself, v. 5. The white color of the elephant signifies excellence and celestial origin. Indra, king of gods, rides on the white elephant Airavata, v. 7, 10. The sea-god is Varuna. The "Father in Añcai" is "Añcaiyappar," Siva in the temple at Añcaikkalam in Cera country, the shrine connected with Vanci or Karur, the capital of the Ceras. Cuntarar's reference to Ancaikkalam and the ocean make it clear that he composed this hymn in remembrance of his visit to the Cêra coastal shrine. These references may also have inspired the local tradition that Ceraman and Cuntarar traveled to Kailasa by sea. Among the paintings depicting the life of Cuntarar at the eleventh-century Cola temple of Brihadisvara in Tanjore, the scene of the ascent shows Cuntarar and Ceraman on their mounts, riding the waves. Cekkilär suggests that this tradition is inaccurate; he makes the two saints ascend to Kailasa through a path in the sky. It is probably best to take the simplest reading of Cuntarar's words, namely, that he wished the ocean's waves to carry his reverent thoughts to the Lord in the seaside shrine of Añcaikkalam. v. 8. I have taken "raramaliranam" to mean "the god who gives all blessings or boons," i.e., Siva. The commentator to the Tevaram Atinam edition suggests that Vanan is one of Siva's ganas. In the general mythological tradition, vanan (Bănăsura) is a son of the demon Bali.

I was a servant who always adorned himself and committed many crimes. O heart, how could I deserve this gift from the Highest God in Notatanmalai, this lovely elephant which journeys through the sky?

4

O heart who took delight in worldly life, as I wallowed in the deep pit of powerful karma caused by the love of women, the Highest God in Notittanmalai led me out, gave me an elephant I did not deserve, made all the immortals surround me in celebration!

Today I have seen the miracle of your devoted servant, who was born on earth and sang your praise, reaching the Golden World.
The Highest God in Notittanmalai displayed my body on the white elephant for the gods themselves to worship.

When I lived a false life, not knowing the way to yoke the senses and worship him with flowers, the Highest God in Notittānmalai entered my heart, gave me immortality, and bestowed upon me, though I did not deserve it,
an angry elephant
before the gods of heaven themselves!

7

As I rode up the hill, seated on the elephant whose steps shook the earth and sky, the king of the sea himself worshipped me with flowers. The Highest God in Notittanmalai has saved me from destruction.

As heaven resounded with Hara's name, with the chants of the Veda and Āgama, and the hymns of the learned brahmins, the Highest God in Notittānmalai showed me the path, the Lord who gives all blessings gave me a splendid elephant to ride.

9

My Lord gave me a fine rutting elephant to ride, and made Indra, Māl, Brahmā, and all the gods give me ceremonial welcome, and when sages of great ascetic power asked: "Who is this man?" the Highest God in Notittānmalai replied, "This is Ūran, my friend."

O Lord of the ocean, carry to the Father in Añcai these ten verses that Ūraṇ of Nāvalūr town where the sweet sugar cane grows, has joyfully composed in sweet, melodious Tamil, in praise of golden Noțittāṇmalai, which rises above the flood in every age of the world.

4 The Servants of the Lord

(POEMS 259-270)

The lives of the first three saints are closely linked with the lives and acts of other Nāyaṇārs. Few among the sixty-three saints named in Cuntarar's "List of the Holy Devotees" (Tirut toṇṭat tokan) are actually mentioned in the rest of the Tēvāram. Yet wherever such reference is made, whether in passing or in detail, it serves to illuminate in an authentic, concrete manner the sense of community that informs the poet-saints' bhakti.

In addition to several Pallava kings and princes, the Irrut tontat tokai contains the names of monarchs of the Pantiva, Cola, and Cera kingdoms. Cuntarar describes many of the saints as "warlike" or "victorious": the very names of some Navanars betray their identity as warriors, generals, or petty chieftains (Enätinätar, Munaiyatuvar, Viranmintar). The culture and milieu of the warriors and princes predominate, but the list of the "Servants of the Lord" is also representative of a broad cross-section of the population, including kings and commoners, men and women, a community consisting of local figures. These Tamil personages are identified individually and in some detail, whereas the sages and devotees of puranic legend, and of distant times and places, are relegated to shadowy descriptions such as "appälum aticcarntar" ("all who seek the Lord's feet everywhere"). It is fitting that the Tirut tontat tokai became the core of what is perhaps the crowning achievement of Tamil Saiva literature, Cēkkilār's "Great Epic," which gives us a vivid sense of the people, places, and values that continue to inspire Tamil Saiva religion to this day.

Campantar and Appar

259. Cuntarar VII.62.8 Kölakkā

The Lord who was moved by the sweet, melodious Tamil hymns

259, 260. It is clear from the references in these verses that the traditions surrounding the lives of Campantar and Appar had crystallized to a great extent by Cuntatar's ume.

that Nanacampantan sang to him every day, and gave him the cymbals, while the whole world looked on, the Lord who is the focus of my thoughts, the Dancer who dances to his demons' songs, the god who lives in Kölili's great temple, praised by his eight hosts—
I have seen him in Kölakkä.

260. Cuntarar VII.88.8 Vilimilalai

You wandered about in the wide world, begging for food in every town.
Wishing to hear good Tamil hymns as you dwelt in holy Milalai, home of scholars of the four Vedas, every day you gave a gold coin to your devotee.
O Lord of the rich, cool town of Vili, favor me also with such grace!

261. Cuntarar VII.67.5 Valivalam

Reaching Valivalam, I saw him who loves the hymns in which I repeat all that melodious Nāṇacampantaṇ and Nāvukkaracar, King of Speech, have sung of him in their good Tamil songs.
I saw the Lord whom all the great gods revere,
the god who, knowing me as his ignorant devotee, melted my stony heart, showed me his holy feet,
and severed every link in my chain of births.

262. Cuntarar VII.78.10 Ketäram

They will dwell in the highest world, who can sing the sweet Tamil hymn composed on our Lord's holy town of Kētāram by Ūran, lowly devotee, and humble servant of Nāvukkaracan, King of Speech, the Tamil poet Nāṇacampantan, and all the devotees of Siva.

Naminanti

263. Appar IV.103 Tiruvārūr

The jewel among devotees, the humble servant of Ārūr's Lord who wears the sweet lotus garland, Nampinanti who led the celebration in Atur of the Uttiram festival in Pańkuṇi, renowned in many towns, made the oil lamps burn on water at Tiruvārūr's shrine—surely the whole world knows this miracle!

А

Our ambrosia in Tiruvārūr is served not only by lordly ascetics who, like their I ord, wear the winding snake at the waist, and the shining moon on the head; he has the best servant of all in Nanti, whose glory rests on his humble service at the feet of every ash-smeared devotee who came to Tiruvārūr's shrine.

Though men of great wealth flock to this shrine, with flags and canopies, fans and torches, drum and conch, though Ārūr is the abode of the flawless Lord himself, yet if Nanti were to leave the town, dark night would descend upon the ash-smeared devotees of the Lord.

Pukalttuņai

264. Cuntarar VII.9.6 Aricirkaraip Puttur

The brahmin, your temple servant, daily carried water from the Aricil

263. The Nayanar Nampinanti is also known as "Nammanti" and "Nanti." 264. Cuntarar's detailed account of the exemplary devotion of Pukaltunai Nayanar of for your bathing rite.

Once, faint with hunger,
he let the water jar fall on your crown and stood trembling.
Your gracious reward to good Pukaltunai was the daily wage of a gold coin,
O pure one in Puttur rich in groves!

Amarnīti

265, Appar IV.98.7 Nallür

This wide world will surely tell the tale of the merchant in Nallür of blooming lotus ponds—how the Lord came to him, commanded him to guard his loincloth with the waistband, played a trick on him, then graciously possessed the man and his long-eyed wife.

Köccenkanan and Canticar

266. Appar IV.65 Cäykkäţu

3

When the blameless spider encircled the Lord, and made a canopy with thread from his mouth

Puttur tallies in most respects with Cëkkilar's. The saint's hunger was due to a famine that ravaged the land. In the Periya purāṇam version, Pukalttuṇai dropped the pot on the liṅga, having been overcome by sleep. Śiva appeared to him in a dream, and blessed him with the daily wage that would help him continue his service to the Lord in times of great hardship. "Akattatimai" refers to temple service.

265. This is the story of Amarnīti Nāyaṇār, whom Cēkkiļār also identifies as a merchant in Nallūr. A great Śaiva philanthropist, Amarnīti gave food and clothing to Śaiva devotees. One day Śiva came to him in the guise of a brahmacārin (a student of sacred learning), and left his loincloth for safekeeping with the merchant while he took his bath. Upon his return the "brahmacārin" found that his loincloth had mysteriously disappeared. Thereupon he demanded that Amarnīti replace it with objects equal in weight. To his surprise Amarnīti found that not all his possessions could equal one loincloth in weight. Only when the saint, along with his wife and child, ascended the scales, could the weight be made up. It was then revealed that the devout merchant and his family had become the "possessions" of none other than the Lord.

266, v. 3. In this account of the spider legend, Appar mentions the rose-apple (nāval) tree, which is the sacred tree of the shrine at Āṇaikkā. For the details of the legend of the spider's for the deity who dwelt in the scant shade of a rose-apple tree that stood exposed on open ground. the Lord who loves to dwell in Caykkatu made him a crowned king and gave him the earth to rule.

6 When good Canti cut off with a sharp axe his father's foot when he obstructed the son's worship, with mantra chants, and garlands of konrai flowers, with the ritual bathing of his God with milk and ghee, the Lord who loves to dwell in Caykkatu gave him the konrai garland from his own cool matted hair.

Many Saints

267. Appar IV.49 Kurukkai Vīrattāņam

Canti sat bathing with fresh milk the linga of sand that he had established under the spreading green ātti tree;

rebirth as Kôccenkanan, see poem 267. v. 6. Siva's gift of the konnai wreath or garland to Cantīcar has been immortalized in a sculptured relief at the temple in Gangaikondacholapuram.

267. In verse 4 Appar speaks of the popular legend of the spider (cilanti) of Āṇaikkā being reborn as King Köccenkanan. According to the local tradition in Anaikka (Tiruvanaikka), the linga at this sacred place stood under a nāval (rose-apple, Sanskrit jambū) tree. A spider who lived on the tree felt compassion for the Lord who had to face the harsh elements. With great devotion he wove a canopy with his body's thread to shelter the image of God. Pleased, Siva rewarded him with rebirth as the devout Côla king and Nayanar. v. 6. As the name "Cākkiyaṇār" indicates, this Nāyaṇār was a Buddhist who converted to Śaivism. Born in Cańkamańkai, he came to Kāñci, a center of Buddhism in South India. It is said that the sight of the image of Siva so moved Cakkiyan that he began the practice of throwing stones at the image as a devotional offering. The strange but sincere devotion of this "heretic" was rewarded with Siva's world and sainthood. In verse 7 Appar provides a graphic description of the famous deed of Kannappar, the hunter-saint of Kalatti. It is interesting to note that, in this hymn, with the exception of the story of Canticar, Appar does not specify the linga as the object of worship. In verse 9 the poet refers to the Nayanar Kanampullar, whose chosen vocation was that of lighting lamps at the temple in Tillai. A poor man, Kanampullar cut grass and sold it in exchange for oil to light the lamps. One day, when no one would buy his grass (kanampul), he tried to light the lamps with the grass; when this failed, he bent over the lamps, burning his own hair as fuel, whereupon Siva appeared and rewarded him with his grace. Siva's "holy attributes" are the eight divine qualities (enkunam), including power and grace. See Appar VI.312.10 (Poem 240).

when his father tried to destroy the rite with a kick, the boy struck out at his foot with a great, deadly axe.

The Lord of the Vīraṭṭāṇam shrine in Kurukkai rewarded him with a dish of fine ambrosial food.

Upon the death of the spider of Āṇaikkā who had made a sacred canopy for his god, the Lord of the Vīraṭṭāṇam shrine in Kurukkai gave him rebirth as King Kōcceṅkaṇāṇ, in the race of the Cōlas of Cōṇāṭu where the Kaveri flows, mingling with many streams.

6
The Lord of the Vīraṭṭāṇam shrine in Kurukkai gave to Cākkiyaṇār, who lived on rice gruel, and threw stones at Śiva, the kingship of heaven and ambrosial food. This Lord loves the Kolli mode, and dances a beautiful dance at night, holding fire in his hand.

7
The hunter approached,
bearing bow and arrow, a guard's weapons,
the offering of meat in his hand;
holding his leather sandals, he bathed his God with ritual water from his pure mouth.
When God's fiery eyes began streaming red blood, and he plucked out his own eyes to stop the wounds,
the Lord of the Vīraṭṭāṇam shrine in Kurukkai at once held him back.

9
The Primal Lord, who contains Umā, the Goddess, in half his frame, is the healing draught who ends the trials of those who worship him.
The Lord of the Vīraṭṭāṇam shrine in Kurukkai bestowed his grace on Kaṇampullar, who followed the precious, good path to release, and he is the one who always gives his holy attributes to his loving devotees.

268. Cuntarar VII.65 Ninriyür

I heard that you once gave wealth, and generosity, and powerful sovereignty to the spider who served you with his offering, turning him into King Cenkanan.
So I have come to your flower feet,
O Lord of holy Ningiyūr of the South, where the surging Ponni brings many gems that gangs of little boys gather in play, and pile up on every street and porch and yard!

I know that you have favored Tanti who attained immortality, receiving beautiful clothes and rich ornaments,
ambrosial food, and a garland to wear, Nāvinukkaraiyan, King of Speech, who composed seven times seven hundred sweet songs, and Kannappar the hunter-saint.
Seeking the love and sweet grace these men have won,
I, too, have come to you,
O Lord of Southern Nintinging
where parrots discourse in chaste, grammatical Tamil!

268, v. 2. In this verse, "Tanti" refers to Canticar, who received the kontai garland and ambrosial food from Siva; this name is derived from danda (a stick), referring to the shepherd's staff, which turned into an axe when Canticar attacked his father. Canticar has a separate shrine in Tamil Siva temples and receives special ritual honors of clothing, ornaments, and garlands. Cuntarar may be referring to the ritual as well as the mythic context. The "Tanti" ("the one with the stick") of the sixty-three Nayanmar is quite distinct from Canticar. According to the hagiographers, the blind man Tanti set to work to extend the temple tank at Tiruvārūr on the side where it was cramped by Jain monastic buildings. When the Jains protested, Tanti claimed that if his cause were just, he would gain eyesight, and his opponents would be blinded. The king, who came to judge the dispute, witnessed Tanți's triumph; the blinded Jains left Tiruvārūr. Nāviņukkaraiyan: a version of "Nāvukkaracan." Cuntarar's claim that Appar composed "seven times seven hundred" songs (elsewhere he makes it a mere seven hundred) reflects the fondness of the Tamil Saivas for crediting their saints with extraordinary feats. "Chaste, grammatical Tamil": "tinaikol centamil," literally, "the pure classical language with its grammatical categories and poetic genres." "Tinai" can mean a number of things, including classes of nouns and the landscape complexes and genres (akam, puram) of classical Tamil poetry.

269, Cuntarar VII.55 Punkur

When the rains failed, and the peasants implored you, crying, "Save us! Give us water for our fields, and we will give you much land!"—you spread over the sky as a shining white cloud, pouring torrential rain, then yourself dammed the flood, and took twelve more *vēli*s of land. Seeing your act of grace, I have come to your holy feet, you who live in holy Puṇkūr of fertile groves!

When you had cured the terrible disease of Eyarkōn, owner of twelve fertile vēlis of land, you turned to Caṇṭi, who had bathed with fresh cow's milk Siva in an image of soft white sand, and then cut off the foot of his father who kicked at his God. You gave him the flowers from your hair. Seeing this act of grace, Lord of the demons, I have reached your golden feet, you who live in holy Punkūr of fertile groves!

You accept as favors
even the faults of your devotees, men like Nāṇacampantaṇ, skilled Tamil poet,
the King of Speech and Nāḷaippōvāṇ,
the skillful gambler, virtuous Cākkiyaṇ, the spider-king, Kaṇṇappaṇ and Kaṇampullaṇ.
Knowing your nature to be thus,
I have come to your feet with the sounding hero's ring,
you who live in holy Puṇkūr,
where golden lotuses bloom in the pools!

269, vv. 2, 3. "Velt": a measure of land. Cuntarar's hymn is the earliest reference to the saint Eyarkön Kalikkama Nāyaṇār in connection with the obscure local legend of Śiva causing rain and receiving land from the peasants. Eyarkôn is better known through the Periya purānam account in which he appears as a contemporary and erstwhile enemy of Cuntarar. This chief of the Eyars (Haihayas?) had sworn enmity with Cuntarar because the latter had had the audacity to use Siva as his messenger (tūtan) in his negotiations with Paravai in

270. Cuntarar VII.39 TIRUT TONTAT TOKAI (THE LIST OF THE HOLY DEVOTEES)

Of all who serve the brahmins of Tillai,
I am the servant.
Of Nīlakaṇṭaṇ, the blessed potter,
I am the servant.
Of Iyaṛpakai who gave without limit,
I am the servant.
Of the servants of Māṛaṇ of Iḷaiyāṇkuṭi,
I am the servant.
Of Meypporuḷ of invincible might,
I am the servant.
Of Viṛaṇmiṇṭaṇ from Kuṇṛai of spacious groves,
I am the servant.
Of Amarnīti with the soft jasmine garland,
I am the servant.
I am the poet Ārūraṇ, slave of my Father in Ārūr.

Tiruvārūr. Šiva appeared to Kalikkāmar and told him that he must approach Cuntarar for a cure for the stomach pain (piņi in v. 3) that afflicted him. Saying that he would die rather than meet his enemy, Kalikkāmar ran a sword through himself. Taking responsibility for this calamity, Cuntarar tried to commit suicide. Šiva intervened, revived Kalikkāmar, and caused a reconciliation between the two saints. v. 4. "The skillful gambler": "karīa cūtaņ," refers to Mūrkka Nāyaṇār, who provided for Šiva's devotees with money earned from gambling (cūtu, cūtāṭṭam). "Nāļaippōvāṇ," "He-would-go-[to the Lord]-the-very-next-day" is the untouchable (pulaiyaṇ) saint Nantaṇār, who defied caste laws and merged with his Lord in the temple at Tillai. Nantaṇār is one of the most popular figures in contemporary Tamil devotional lore.

270. The refrain: "Of the servants of . . . , I am the servant": "aṭiyārkkum aṭiyēn." Further details about the Nayanars listed in the Tirut tontat tokai may be found in the excellent, detailed comparative study of the accounts of Cuntarar, Nampi Āṇṭār Nampi, and Cēkkilār in Dorai Rangaswamy, Religion and Philosophy, vol. 2. v. 1. "Tillaival antanar": The (Three Thousand) Brahmins settled in Tillai. v. 2. Kalayan: Kuńkiliyakkalayar, who sold his wife's wedding necklace in order to provide incense (kunkiliyam) for the temple ritual. "Tāyan of the complete scythe" is the Nāyanār Vāṭṭāyar or Arivāṭṭāyar, so called because he tried to cut off his own head with a scythe (arival) when he accidentally dropped the food offerings he was carrying for his special worship of Siva. v. 3. The pilgrim who would "go ... the very next day," "Nāļaippovār," is Nantaņār. "Cemmaiye": "straightaway," hence "the very next day." v. 4. Pey: The semale saint Karaikkal Ammaiyar. Kulaccirai: The pious minister of the Pandyan king. v. 5 Some commentators take "nattamiku tanti" to mean "the devout Tanți." The translation "Tanți who received vision [națiam, 'eye,' 'sight']," is more in keeping with the legend in which Siva restores the blind Nayanar's sight. See Poem 268. Tirumulan: Tirumular, author of the Tirumantiram. v. 6. Kalarırrarivar: Ceraman Perumal Nāyaṇār, author of the Ponvaṇṇattantāti and other works in the eleventh Tirumurai. v. 7. The commentators take "poyyatimaiy illāta pulavar" ("poets who shun crooked patrons") to mean Tamil poets of the Cankam age. Aiyaṭikal Kāṭavarkōṇ: an early Pallava ruler, auOf Prince Eripattan with the sharp spear,
I am the servant.
Of the servants of Lord Ēṇāti,
I am the servant.
Of Lord Kaṇṇappan, famed for his knowledge,
I am the servant.
Of the servants of Kalayan of Kaṭavūr,
I am the servant.
Of generous Māṇakkañcāran with shoulders like hills,
and the servants of Tāyan of the complete scythe,
I am the servant.
Of Äṇāyan of Maṅkai on the turbulent river,
I am the servant.
I am the poet Ārūran, slave of my Father in Ārūr.

Of Mūrtti who reigned over the world through the three emblems of sovereignty, I am the servant.

Of Murukaṇ and Uruttira Pacupati, I am the servant.

Of the holy pilgrim who would "go to the Lord the very next day," I am the servant.

Of the servants of holy Kuripputtoṇṭaṇ, I am the servant.

Of great Caṇṭi, devotee of the Lord who gives us release, the young man who worshipped the linga and cut off with an axe the foot of his own father when he angrily disrupted the child's sincere worship of the Lord's holy image, thor of the Kṣĕttirat tiru venpā. v. 8. "Upright" ("Ninracīr") Netumāran is identified as the Pandyan king of Maturai who was brought back to Śaivism by Campantar. v. 9. Kōṭpuli of Nāṭṭiyattānkuṭi, father of Ciṅkaṭi and Vaṇappakai. v. 10. This verse lists categories of saintly persons, rather than individual Nāyaṇārs. The categories themselves are open to several interpretations, ranging from the very general to the technically specific. "Every man who meditates on Siva" ("cittattaic cu aṇpalē vaṇpār") is taken to signify yogis or cittars; "paramaṇaiye pāṭturār" ("those who sing only of the Lord") could indicate poet-saints such as Cuntarar himselt or those (such as the otuvārs) employed as singers of hymns in the temples. "Men who thrice daily [at the three daily rituals of worship] touch the Lord's holy image" refers to temple priests; the ash-smeared sages (muṇwar) are probably legendary sages who figure in parame narratives. "Appālum aṭiccārmār" ("all who seek the Lord's feet everywhere") suggests devotees from distant places and far-off times. v. 11. "The noble queen" is Mankaiyarkkaraca, the Pandyan queen celebrated by Campantar.

I am the servant. I am the poet Ārūraṇ, slave of my Father in Ārūr.

Of blessed Nāvukkaracan, "Lord of Speech," who took for his glory nothing other than the good Lord's name in which all blessings abide, I am the servant. Of the servants of the noble lord Kulaccirai, I am the servant. Of Perumilalaik kurumpan and the revered Pey, I am the servant. Of the servants of princely Appūti, I am the servant. Of Nilanakkan from Cattamankai by the sounding river, I am the servant. Of the servants of the noble Lord Naminanti, I am the servant. I am the poet Arūran, slave of our Father in Arūr.

5 Of the servants of my master Campantan who worships nothing but the feet of the Lord who wears in his hair fragrant flowers swarming with humming bees and the good konrai's honey-filled blossom, I am the servant. Of the servants of Kalikkāman, prince of the Eyars, I am the servant. Of the servants of our Master Tirumulan, I am the servant. Of Tanti who was blessed with vision, and of Mürkkan, I am the servant. Of Comāci Māran of Ampar, I am the servant. I am the poet Ārūran, slave of our Father in Ārūr.

6
Of Cākkiyan who devoutly threw stones at the feet of the Lord who shares his body with Umā, whose lovely breasts are bound with the breastcloth,
I am the servant.

Of generous Cirappuli of good fame,

I am the servant.

Of Ciruttontan of Cenkāttankuti,

I am the servant.

Of Kalarirrarivan, generous as a showering cloud, I am the servant.

Of the servants of Kananatan of Kali-on-the-sea, I am the servant.

Of Kūrran of the victorious spear, prince of Kalantai, I am the servant.

I am the poet Ārūran, slave of our Father in Ārūr.

7

Of all poets who shun crooked patrons, I am the servant.

Of King Pukal Colan who was slain in battle at fertile Karuvür field,

I am the servant.

Of the true devotee, Naracińka Munaiyaraiyan, I am the servant.

Of Atipattan of wave-washed Nākai-on-the-sea, I am the servant.

Of the servants of Kalikkampan of the drawn bow, who cut off enemies' arms,

Of Kaliyan, and of Catti, the Variñcaiyar chief with the hero's anklet,

I am the servant.

Of the servants of Aiyaṭikaḷ, King of the Kāṭavas, I am the servant.

I am the poet Ārūraņ, slave of our Father in Ārūr.

8

Of Lord Kanampullan who worshipped the feet of the Lord with the poison-stained throat as his only shield, and of Kari,

I am the servant.

Of the servants of "upright" Netumāran who won the battle of Nelvēli, king who has mastered his mind and senses, I am the servant,

Of the servants of Vāyilān of ancient Mayilai, where the red coral washed ashore by the sea brightens the sky,

I am the servant.

Of Prince Munaiyatuvān of the spear of war, I am the servant. I am the poet Ārūran, slave of our Father in Ārūr.

9

Of the servants of Kalarcinkan, Karava king, sovereign protector of sea-girt earth, I am the servant.
Of Prince Irankali with the flower garland, and of the servants of Ceruttunai, King of Tancai, I am the servant.
Of Pukaltunai who meditated only on the golden feet of the dancer who dances, making the snakes dance on the tigerskin band at his waist, I am the servant.

Of lordly Kötpuli of the victorious spear, I am the servant. I am the poet Ārūran, slave of our Father in Ārūr.

10

Of all who worship Siva as his devotees,
I am the servant.
Of those who sing only of the Lord,
I am the servant.
Of every man who meditates on Siva,
I am the servant.
Of all who are born in holy Ārūr,
I am the servant.
Of men who thrice daily touch the Lord's holy image,
I am the servant.
Of sages who wear the sacred ash,
I am the servant.
Of all who seek the Lord's feet everywhere,
I am the servant.
I am the poet Ārūran, slave of our Father in Ārūr.

11

Of renowned Pūcal of Ninravūr, brahmin who chanted the sacred Veda,
Of the noble queen with the beautiful bracelets, and of Nēcan,
I am the servant.
Of Cenkan who ruled the world as King of the South,
I am the servant.

Of the Pāṇaṇ musician Tirunīlakaṇṭaṇ, I am the servant.
Those who delight in the song of devotion sung by Ārūraṇ, prince of holy Nāvalūr, who loves Icaiñāṇi and Caṭaiyaṇ, true devotees of my Lord Araṇ's feet, will become lovers of our Father in Ārūr.

APPENDIXES AND GLOSSARY

APPENDIX A

Important Sacred Places in the Tēvāram

The following sacred places have five or more Tēvāram hymns dedicated to them.

C - Campantar; A - Appar; Cu - Cuntarar

Place	Total no. of hymns	No. of hymns by each saint
Cōlanāţu, North of the River Kaveri
Aiyāru (Tiruvaiyāru)	18	C 5; A 12; Cu 1
Āṇaikkā (Tiruvāṇaikkā)	7	C 3; A 3; Cu 1
Chidambaram (Kōyil, Tillai)	11	C 2; A 8; Cu 1
Cīrkāļi (under twelve names)	71	C 67; A 3; Cu 1
Innampar	5	C 1; A 4
Kalippālai	8	C 2; A 5; Cu 1
Ma l apāṭi	6	C 3; A 2; Cu l
Năraiyūr (Tirunāraiyūr)	5	C3; A2
Neyttāṇam	6	C 1; A 5
Palanam	6	C 1; A 5
Veņkāţu (Tiruveņkāţu)	6	C 3; A 2; Cu 1
Colanatu, South of the River Kaveri
Ārūr (Tiruvārūr), 37 hymns for three shrines:
Main shrine	34	C 5; A 21; Cu 8
Aranegi	2	A 2
Paravaiyun-mantali	1	Cu 1
Āvaṭuturai	8	C 1; A 5; Cu 2
Côrrutturai	6	C 1; A 4; Cu 1

Place	Total no. of hymns	No. of hymns by each saint
Ițaimarutūr (Tiruvițaimarutūr)	12	C 6; A 5; Cu 1
Kaṭavūr (or Kaṭaiyūr), 8 hymns for two sh	rines:
Vīraţţam	5	C 1; A 3; Cu 1
Mayāṇam	3	C 1; A 1; Cu 1
Magaikkāţu (Vedāraņyam)	9	C 4; A 4; Cu 1
Nākaikkārōṇam	7	C 2; A 4; Cu 1
Nākēccaram (Tirunākēccaram)	6	C 2; A 3; Cu 1
Nallāru (Tirunaļļāru)	7	C 4; A 2; Cu 1
Nallūr	5	C3; A2
Pukalür, 9 hymns for two shrines:		ř
Main shrine	8	C 2; A 5; Cu 1
Varttamānīccaram	1	C 1
Valañculi	6	C 2; A 3; Cu 1
Vīlimilalai (Tiruvīlimilalai)	24	C 15; A 8; Cu 1
Pănținățu (Pănțiya-nățu)
Ålavåy (Maturai)	11	C 9; A 2
Națunățu (the macro-region between Cōla of Tonțainățu)	ınāțu and th	e northern region
Àmāttūr	.5	C 2; A 2; Cu 1
Annāmalai (Tiruvannāmalai)	5	C 2; A 3
Atikai (Tiruvatikai Vīraţţāṇam)	18	C 1; A 16; Cu 1
Mutukungam (Vrddhācalam)	11	C 7; A 1; Cu 3
Toṇṭaināṭu
Kacci (Kāñci, Kanchipuram), 17 hymns fo	or five shrine	s:
Ēkampam	12	C 4; A 7; Cu 1
Mērraļi	2	A 1; Cu 1
Ōṇakāntaṇṛaļi	1	Cu 1
Anēkatańkāvatam	1	Cu 1
Nerik kāraikkātu	1	C 1
Mārpēru	6	C 2; A 4
Orriyūr (Tiruvorriyūr)	8	C 1; A 5; Cu 2

The Twenty-three *Paṇ*Scale-Types in the Tēvārām

Classical Tamil
Pan Scale-Type

Carnatic Rāga Scale-Type (similar to the classical pan)

Yadukula Kāmbodhi

Kannada Kāmbodhi

Bhūpālam?

Āhiri

Cevvali Takkaräkam Puranīrmai

Puranîrmai Pañcamam

Kāntāram Hejjajji? Mohanam?

Națțapățai Harikāmbodhi or Nățțaikkurinci Antălikkurinci Śailadeśāksi or Sāmā

Antāļikkurinci Sailadešāksi or Sām Palampancuram Śankarābharaņam Mēkarākakkurinci Nīlāmbari

Kollikkauvānam Sindhu Kannada or Nata Bhairavi

Palantakkarākam Suddha Sāvēri or Ārabhi Kurinci Harikāmbodhi? Malahari? Nattarākam (Śubha) Pantuvarāļi

Națțarākam (Subha) Pantuva Viyālakkurinci Saurāștram Centurutti Madhyamāvati Takkēci Kāmbodhi

Kolli Sindhu Kannada or Nauroj

Intalam Neļitapañcami

Kāntārapancamam Kedāra Gauļa or Nārāyaņa Gauļa

Kaucikam Bhairavi Piyantaikkāntāram Hejjajji

Cīkāmaram Nādanāmakriyā or Māyāmalava

Gauļa Pantuvarāli

Cätäri

Note: Appar's Tāṇṭakam hymns are sung in the rāga Harikāmbodhi.

Aṭṭavīraṭṭāṇam: The Sites of the Eight Heroic Deeds of Śiva

Site	Deed
(Tiruk-) Kantiyür Vīrattam	Siva cut off one of the heads of Brahmā
(Tiruk-) Kövalür Vīrattam	Siva killed the demon Andhaka
(Tirup-) Pariyalür Vīrattam	Śiva destroyed Dakşa's sacrifice
(Tiruk-) Kurukkai Vīrattam	Siva burned Kāma, god of Love
(Tiruv-) Atikai Vīraṭṭam	Siva destroyed the three cities of the demons
(Tiru-) Valuvūr Vīraţţam	Siva flayed the elephant-demon Gajāsura, and danced with the flayed skin
(Tiruk-) Kaṭavūr Vīraṭṭam	Siva saved the boy Mārkaṇḍeya by kicking Kāla, god of Death
(Tiru-) Virkuți Vīrațțam	Siva destroyed the demon Jalandhara

Major Puranic Myths of Siva in the Tēvāram

Different versions of the myths of Siva can be found in the Mahābhārata and Sanskrit Purāṇas, such as the Śiva, Linga, Vāmana, and Skanda Purāṇas. The Tamil Kanta purāṇam, which presents the major myths of Śiva in their authoritative Tamil version, is much later than the Tēvāram hymns. I have not followed any one of the above accounts exclusively in the general summaries I provide here. Readers interested in details and variants and their relationship to the mūrtis (iconographic forms) of Śiva may consult the following books: for the Sanskrit, Wendy D. O'Flaherty, Hindu Myths (Penguin, 1975), and Stella Kramrisch, The Presence of Śiva (Princeton University Press, 1981); and for the Tamil in relation to the Sanskrit, volume 1 of M. A. Dorai Rangaswamy, Religion and Philosophy of the Tēvāram (University of Madras, 1958–1959). These are cited below by the authors' surnames and titles abbreviated as HM, PS, and RPT.

SIVA MANIFESTS HIMSELF AS THE FIERY Linga: LINGODBHAVA-MŪRTI

At the end of a cosmic era, Brahmā and Viṣṇu were arguing with each other, each claiming that he was the supreme deity and the creator of the universe. Suddenly a great column of light—a fiery linga—appeared before them. The two rival gods agreed that the one who first succeeded in finding the top or base of the immense column would be acknowledged by the other as the supreme Lord. Taking the form of a boar, Viṣṇu burrowed deep into the earth, while Brahmā, turning himself into a wild goose, flew up into space. The search proved to be futile, and the gods were forced to admit defeat. At this point, Śiva graciously revealed himself in the cosmic linga (see illus. 10) and, their pride humbled, Brahmā and Viṣṇu bowed to him and declared Śiva's supremacy. (O'Flaherty, HM, 137—41; Kramrisch, PS, 158—78. Dorai Rangaswamy, RPT, 196—209.)

344 APPENDIX D

THE DESTRUCTION OF THE THREE CITIES: TRIPURÄNTAKA-MÜRTI

Tārakākşa, Kamalākşa, and Vidyunmālin, the three sons of the demon Tāraka, once practiced austerities (tapas) and won the gift of immense power from Brahmā. According to this boon, the three demons would live for a thousand years in three invincible, moving cities or castles (tripura), wreaking destruction in the universe, and the castles could be destroyed only by a cosmic arrow that would merge them into one and set fire to them. Siva Mahādeva alone could accomplish the task. At the end of the thousand years the gods, elements, and other cosmic forces became the various parts of the bow, the arrow, and Siva's chariot. With Brahmā as his charioteer, Siva went forth, shot the single arrow of fire, and destroyed the three cities. (O'Flaherty, HM, 125–37; Kramrisch, PS, 405–12. Dorai Rangaswamy, RPT, 304–22.)

ŚIVA SWALLOWS POISON AT THE CHURNING OF THE OCEAN: VIŞĀPAHARAŅA-MŪRTI

The gods and demons decided to churn the celestial ocean of milk in order to bring forth amṛta (ambrosia), the elixir of immortality. With Mount Mandara for their churning stick and the world-snake Śeṣa or Vāsuki for the rope, they began churning the ocean. To their dismay, the first substance to rise from the ocean was a black mass of Kālakūṭa, the world-poison. The frightened gods and demons appealed to Śiva Mahādeva to rescue them. Śiva at once seized the poison and drank it, retaining it in his throat, which turned blue-black on account of the poison. (O'Flaherty, HM, 274–80; Kramrisch, PS, 145–52; Dorai Rangaswamy, RPT, 262–71.)

RĀVAŅA TRIES TO LIFT KAİLĀSA: RĀVAŅĀNUGRAHA-MŪRTI

Răvaṇa, demon-king of Lankā, had acquired great power and was puffed up with pride. Flying about in his celestial car, he saw Mount Kailâsa, abode of Śiva in the Himalayas, and resolved to uproot it and transport it to his southern realm. When the arrogant demon tried to lift the mountain, Śiva, who was seated at ease with the Goddess and his retinue, simply laughed, and set his big toe on the mountain, crushing Rāvaṇa's ten heads and twenty shoulders. (See illus. 11.) Terrified, Rāvaṇa repented and sang hymns of praise for Śiva. The merciful god not only forgave the demon, but also gave him several boons. (Dorai Rangaswamy, RPT, 296–303.)

SIVA SEVERS ONE OF BRAHMA'S HEADS: BRAHMAŚIRAŚCHEDA-MŪRTI, BHAIRAVA, BHIKSĀTANA, KANKĀLA-MŪRTI

In his terrifying persona as Bhairava, Siva cut off, with the mere snap of a nail, one of the five heads of Brahma, when the latter arrrogantly declared himself to be the supreme creator-god. Brahma's skull stuck firmly to Bhairava's left palm. In order to expiate for the sin of cutting off a brahmin's head, Siva had to take the Kāpālika vow of wandering all over the world as a naked beggar (see illus. 9), carrying the skull as his alms bowl, until the day it fell from his hand. As Bhiksatana, the naked beggar, Siva came to the Pine Forest (Dārukavana, where he shocked the sages with his lewdness and nudity and seduced their wives. At the end of a long confrontation with Siva, the sages realized Siva's greatness and worshipped the linga (phallus) that he let fall, as his sign (linga).

After his encounter with the sages, Siva-Bhairava continued his wanderings and eventually reached the abode of Vișnu. When Vișnu's gatekeeper Visyaksena refused to let him in, Siva impaled the guard on his trident and walked in with the corpse (as Kankāla-mūrti). A conciliatory Visnu offered his own blood to Siva, but even vast streams of Visnu's blood could not fill up Siva's skull-bowl. It was only when Siva reached the city of Vārānasī (Benares) that Brahmā's skull vanished from his hand. (O'Flaherty, HM, 141-54 [the Pine Forest myths]; Kramrisch, PS, ch. 9; Dorai Rangaswamy; RPT, 372-416.)

THE DESTRUCTION OF DAKSA'S SACRIFICE: DAKŞĀRI-MŪRTI

The Prajāpati (progenitor) Dakṣa, father of Śiva's wife Satī, performed a great sacrifice to which he invited all the gods except his son-in-law Siva. When Satī went to the sacrifice, Daksa insulted Siva to her face. Unable to bear the insult, Satī immolated herself. Crazed with grief and anger, Śiva-as Vīrabhadra, or through the agency of Vīrabhadra-destroyed Dakṣa's sacrifice and mutilated the various gods who had come to the sacrifice. He cut off Dakşa's head and reglaced it with that of a goat. (O'Flaherty, HM, 118-25; Kramrisch, PS, 301-33; Dorai Rangaswamy, RPT, 323-36.)

SIVA BURNS KĀMA, GOD OF LOVE: KĀMĀRI-MŪRTI, DAKŞIŅĀMŪRTI

After the destruction of Dakṣa's sacrifice, Satī was reborn as Pārvatī or Umā, daughter of the mountain Himalaya. Meanwhile, Śiva withdrew from the world and sat in yogic meditation in a Himalayan forest. The 346 APPENDIX D gods sought to bring about the union of Śiva and Pārvatī, so that a powerful son born to them would eventually lead the army of the gods to victory over the demons. They asked Kāma, the god of Desire, to shoot a flower-arrow at Śiva as he sat in meditation, to make him fall in love with Umā. However, when Kāma aimed his arrow at Śiva, the god opened the fiery eye on his forehead and burned Kāma to ashes. In some versions of the myth, Kāma disturbs Śiva as he sits as Dakṣiṇāmūrti under a banyan tree (āl), discoursing on supreme wisdom to a group of sages. (O'Flaherty, HM, 154–59; Kramrisch, PS, 349–63; Dorai Rangaswamy, RPT, 337–42 [Kāmāntaka], 417–39 [Dakṣiṇāmūrti].)

THE SLAYING OF ANDHAKA: ANDHAKAVADHA-MÜRTI

The Goddess (Pārvatī) once crept up behind Śiva and playfully covered his three eyes with her hands. Immediately, the universe was plunged in darkness. Drops of sweat fell from Śiva's forehead, and a frightful creature was born from them. Since this demonic creature was blind, he was called Andhaka ("the blind one"). Andhaka performed extreme austerities and won a great boon from Brahmā: nothing and no one in the universe would be able to kill him until the demon lusted after a divine woman who was "a mother" to him. Drunk with power, Andhaka rampaged unchecked in the universe, until one day he coveted the goddess Pārvatī, whose playful act had been responsible for his birth. Andhaka fought a terrible battle with Śiva but was overcome in the end. Śiva impaled him on his trident and danced until the demon repented and begged to become Śiva's devotee. Śiva then turned him into his demon-attendant Bhṛṅgi. (O'Flaherty, HM, 168–72; Kramrisch, PS, 374–83; Dorai Rangaswamy, RPT, 369–71.)

ŚIVA KILLS THE DEMON JALANDHARA: JALANDHARĀSURA-SAMHĀRA-MŪRTI

The demon Jalandhara was born when Siva cast his rage, in the form of the fire from his eye, into the ocean. Jalandhara became king of the demons, married the chaste Vṛndā, but desired the goddess Pārvatī. In the course of his combat with Siva over the Goddess, Siva drew a great wheel (cakra) in the waters and challenged the demon to lift it above his head. When Jalandhara tried to do so, the wheel severed his head. Later Siva gave the wheel to Viṣṇu to keep as his permanent attribute. (Kramrisch, PS, 388–94; Dorai Rangaswamy, RPT, 352–58.)

THE SLAYING OF THE ELEPHANT-DEMON: GAJĀSURA-SAMHĀRA-MŪRTI

The demon Gajāsura, who had the form of an elephant (gaja), persecuted the gods. When he attacked Śiva and Pārvatī the Goddess was terrified, but Śiva effortlessly killed the demon and flayed his skin. He draped the skin, dripping with blood, as a cloak around him, and danced a dance of victory. (Dorai Rangaswamy, RPT, 343-51.)

ŠIVA RESCUES MĀRKAŅDEYA FROM DEATH: KĀLA-SAŅHĀRA-MŪRTI

The childless sage Mṛkaṇḍu appealed to Śiva and won from him the boon of a son. However, Mārkaṇḍeya, the gifted son who was born to the sage, was given a life span of only sixteen years. Mārkaṇḍeya grew up as a great devotee of Śiva. As Mārkaṇḍeya was worshipping a liṅga of Śiva on the day that his life was destined to end, the god of Death (Yama or Kāla) himself came to take the boy's soul away, but Mārkaṇḍeya clung to the liṅga and cried out to Śiva. Śiva emerged from the liṅga, and kicked and killed Death. (See illus. 12.) Śiva revived Kāla only on the condition that the devout boy should receive the gift of immortality. (Kramrisch, PS, 165; Dorai Rangaswamy, RPT, 359–68.)

ARJUNA AND ŠIVA AS THE HUNTER: KIRĀTĀRJUNA-MŪRTI OR PĀRTHĀNUGRAHA-MŪRTI

The encounter between Siva and the hero Arjuna is an important episode in the Mahābhārata. On behalf of the Pāṇḍava brothers, Arjuna went to the Himalayas and practiced great austerities in order to win from Siva the infallible Pāsupata, the weapon that would help the Pāṇḍavas annihilate their enemies in war. Wishing to test the courage and dedication of the hero, Siva appeared to him in the guise of a Kirāta (hunter), quarreled with him over a wild boar, and challenged him to combat. In the course of the combat, the god stripped the hero of all his weapons, but Arjuna continued to fight with his bare hands. Pleased, Siva revealed himself and gave Arjuna the Pāsupata weapon. (Kramrisch, PS, 257–59; Dorai Rangaswamy, RPT, 281–85.)

SIVA RECEIVES THE GANGES IN HIS MATTED HAIR: GANGADHARA-MŪRTI

Bhagīratha, a member of the solar race of kings, performed severe tapas (austerities) in order to bring the celestial river Ganges down to earth and the nether world, so that her water would purify and sanctify the ashes of his ancestors, who had been burned to death by the anger of a sage. The Ganges was such a mighty river that the earth would not be able to withstand the full impact of her descent. At Bhagīratha's request, Śiva graciously held out his matted hair to catch the river as she descended, and softened her journey to earth. The Ganges became a permanent attribute of the god's hair. (Dorai Rangaswamy, RPT, 272–80.)

348 APPENDIX D

GLOSSARY

Only names and words that occur frequently in the poems and the introductory essay have been included in this glossary. Sanskrit terms have been identified by (S).

acai The basic metrical unit in classical Tamil poetry.

Āgama (S) Sacred texts treating ritual, iconography, and other subjects related to temples and image worship.

akam "Interior," "the inner part"; the genre of love poetry in classical Tamil (Cankam) literature.

Akattiyar Sanskrit "Agastya," a legendary sage and culture-hero of the Tamils.

akaval Standard meter of classical Tamil poetry of the Cankam era.

akṣa (S) Also rudrākṣa ("Rudra's [Śiva's] eye"). Tamil akku; seeds sacred to Śiva, worn by Śaiva devotees.

ālāpana (S) Form of improvisation used in elaborating a rāga scale-type in classical Indian music.

Ālvār Tamil Vaiṣṇava poet-saint; the twelve Ālvārs are the authors of the Tamil Vaiṣṇava hymns of the Nālāyirat tivviyap pirapantam.

Aran Sanskrit "Hara" ("the Seizer"), a name of Śiva.

Ari Sanskrit "Hari"; name of Vișnu.

Arjuna One of the five Pāṇḍava brothers, heroes of the Mahābhārata epic; through his devotion, wins Pāsupata weapon from Śiva.

arul Divine grace, an important doctrine in Śaiva Siddhānta theology.

Arupattumuvar "The Sixty-three"; the sixty-three saints (Nāyanmār) of the Tamil Śaiva tradition.

aṭaṅkaṇmurai "The complete canon"; a term applied to the collection of the seven books of hymns composed by Appar, Campantar, and Cuntarar.

ațiyar Devotee; "one who is at the feet (of the Lord)."

attamurtti Sanskrit "Aştāmurti"; Śiva as he manifests himself in "eight forms": the five elements, the sun, moon, and the sacrificing priest.

350 GLOSSARY

Attavirattanam The sites of the Eight Heroic Deeds of Siva in the Tamil region.

Ayan Sanskrit "Aja" ("the unborn"), a name of Brahmā, the creatorgod.

bhakta (S) Devotee; see ațiyar and tonțar.

bhakti (S) Devotion to God.

Bhikṣāṭana (S) A mythic form of Śiva, in which he wanders as a beggar, with a skull for his alms bowl.

Brahmā (S) The Creator in the Hindu triad of cosmic gods.

brahmin Member of the priestly class in the Hindu system of four classes; the brahmin class ranks highest in the general hierarchy of classes.

camayakuravar The saints Campantar, Appar, Cuntarar, and Māṇik-kavācakar as the "Preceptors" of the Tamil Saiva tradition.

Cankam Classical period of Tamil civilization and literature.

cantăṇācāriyārkaļ The "lineage" of fourteen teachers and authors of the Śaiva Siddhānta treatises.

Canțicar One of the sixty-three Tamil Saiva saints.

cariyai Sanskrit caryā, service, one of the four ways of devotion in the Saiva Siddhānta system.

Cēkkilār Author of the Periya Purāṇam, the lives of the sixty-three Tamil Śaiva saints.

cel A fish.

Cēra One of the three ancient Tamil kingdoms or "lands"; the ruler of the Cēra kingdom.

cerunti Ochna squarrosa, a plant with yellow-orange flowers.

Cilappatikāram "Epic of the Anklet," Tamil epic of the late classical period.

cīr Metrical unit in classical Tamil poetry, a "foot" made up of acais.

Civacariyar A learned and initiated person in the Tamil Saiva tradition, qualified to perform Agamic rites.

Cola One of the three ancient Tamil kingdoms; the ruler of the Cola (or Chola) land.

erukku One of the flowers worn by Śiva.

etukai Rhyming or correspondence of the second syllable of the first words in the lines of a verse; a standard feature of much of Tamil verse. gana (S) Attendant of Śiva, usually a ghost, demon, or other spirit.

Gaņeśa (S) Also known as Gaṇapati, lord of the gaṇas; elephant-headed son of Siva and Pārvatī; remover of obstacles to success.

Gangā (S) The river Ganges.

ghee Clarified butter; one of the "five products" of the cow.

gotra (S) Clan group tracing descent from one of the Vedic seers (ṛṣi).

icai Music; musical Tamil; genres associated with music in Tamil literature.

Īcan Sanskrit Īśa, "the Lord"; a name of Śiva.

Kailāsa (S) Mountain, the abode of Śiva in the Himalayas.

Kāla (S) Also Yama, Yama-dharma-rāja; god of death.

kalal Ring of heroism or victory worn on the leg by heroes in classical Tamil civilization; foot.

Kali A meter in late classical and post-Cankam Tamil poetry.

Kāma (S) God of Love.

Kankāļa A form of Śiva, in which he carries a corpse or skeleton on his shoulder.

Kannappar The hunter-saint; one of the sixty-three Tamil Saiva saints.

Kāpālika (S) Person who has undertaken a vow of begging with a skull as an alms bowl; a Śaiva sect.

Kapālin (S) "He who bears the skull"; a name of Śiva.

Kāraikkāl Ammaiyār Early Tamil Śaiva woman poet-saint.

karma (S) Tamil vinai (act, deed); the law of action leading to effect and rebirth.

kaṭṭaļai The rhythmic and musical mold in which the Tēvāram hymns are cast.

Kaveri Major river in Tamilnadu; also known as "Ponni."

kāvya (S) Ornate poetry in the classical or "court" style.

kayal Type of fish.

kentai Type of fish.

kiriyai Ritual service; one of the four types of activities undertaken toward liberation according to Śaiva Siddhānta theology.

konkam Cochlospermum gossypium, a tree with yellow flowers.

konrai Laburnum or cassia tree, the flower of which is sacred to Siva.

koţukoţţi A dance; also a kind of drum.

köyil Temple; in classical Tamil, abode of a king.

kuravam Webera corymbosa, a shrub.

Kurinci The pan musical mode appropriate to the kurinci (hill) land-scape.

kuriñci Conehead plant (Strobilanthus); the hill landscape in Cankam poetry.

kuruntam A kind of lime tree.

Kuruntokai One of the eight anthologies of classical Tamil poetry.

kuruntokai A classical Tamil meter. The Tēvāram poet Appar's Kuruntokai hymns are cast in this meter.

kūviļam The flower of the bilva tree, sacred to Śiva.

linga (S) "Sign," phallus (as the male "sign"); symbol and aniconic image of Siva.

Mahādeva (S) "The great god," name of Śiva.

Māl Also Tirumāl, Tamil name for Vișnu.

Māņikkavācakar Tamil Śaiva saint; author of the Tiruvācakam.

mantra (S) Sacred chant; Vedic chant; the Vedas.

marai Veda, primary sacred text.

mattam Datura, a flower worn by Śiva.

monai Correspondence of the initial sounds of several words within a line of Tamil poetry; a standard feature of Tamil verse.

mulavam or mulavu A kind of concert drum.

mullai Type of jasmine; the pastoral landscape in classical Tamil poetry.

mūrti (S) Tamil mūrtti; iconographic form of a divinity.

Murukan Tamil hill-god, identified as Kumaran (Sanskrit Kumāra) or Skanda, the son of Śiva.

mūvar The three poet-saints Appar, Campantar, and Cuntarar.

muyalakan Apasmārapuruṣa, dwarf-demon of ignorance, on whom Siva dances as Naṭarāja.

namaccivāya From Sanskrit "namaḥ śivāya," "salutation to Śiva"; the sacred mantra (chant) for Śaivas; see pañcākṣara.

ñānam Sanskrit jīnāna, "wisdom," one of the four disciplines leading to liberation in Śaiva Siddhānta theology.

Națarāja (S) Lord of the Dance; Siva as the cosmic dancer.

nāțu Country, region, or realm; regional subdivision of the Tamil area.

Nāyaṇār One of the sixty-three saints of the Tamil Śaiva tradition. Plural Nāyaṇmār.

Nēricai A classical Tamil pan musical mode; a musical and poetic genre used by the Tēvāram poet Appar; verses in the nēricai meter.

neytal Nymphaea stellata, the dark lily; the seaside landscape in classical Tamil poetry.

otuvār Professional singer of hymns from the Tēvāram and other Tamil Saiva texts at Siva temples in the Tamil region.

Pallava Dynasty that held power in the Tamil region between the second and ninth centuries A.D.

pan Scale-type or mode in Tamil music of the classical age and the Tē-vāram hymns.

pāṇar In the classical (Caṅkam) civilization, a musician who performs to the accompaniment of the yāl.

pañcākṣara (S) "The five sacred syllables": "namaḥ śivāya"; see namac-civāya.

pāṇi A classical song and dance genre, probably associated with religious themes.

päntarankam One of Śiva's dances.

Pāntiya Also "Pandyan"; one of the three ancient Tamil kingdoms.

parai A kind of drum.

paripāțal A musical meter in late classical Tamil poetry.

pāśa (S) (Tamil pācam) "fetter," the bonds of karma in Śaiva Siddhānta philosophy.

pasu (S) The individual soul in Saiva Siddhanta.

Pāśupata (S) A Śaiva sect; a celestial weapon won by Arjuna from Śiva.

Pasupati (S) "Lord of Souls (or Beasts)," a name of Siva.

pati (S) "The Lord" in Saiva Siddhanta; Tamil pati: a sacred place.

patikam In the Tamil Śaiva tradition, a devotional hymn, usually consisting of ten or eleven stanzas; a stanza from such a hymn.

patutam Type of dance.

Periya purānam Also Tirut tontar purānam; see Cēkkilar.

pulaiyan An outcaste or person of low caste, whose occupation involves handling unclean substances and objects.

pūjā (S) Ritual worship according to the Agamas.

puram "Exterior," dealing with war and public affairs; the "public" genre of classical Tamil poetry.

Purāņa (S) Compendium of myths; a sacred text in Hinduism.

rāga (S) Scale-type in Indian classical music.

Rudra (S) Vedic god identified with Siva.

rudrākşa See akşa

Śańkara (S) Name of Śiva.

Śatarudrīya (S) Section of chants in praise of Rudra in the Yajur Veda.

Śaiva (S) A worshipper of Śiva.

Śaiva Siddhānta (S) The philosophical and theological system of the Tamil Śaiva sect.

Śiva (S) "The auspicious"; the destroyer-god in the Hindu triad.

smṛti (S) Traditional sacred texts, distinguished from Vedic literature.

śruti (S) The Vedas, as eternal scripture without a human author.

stotra (S) Hymn in praise of a god; usually in Sanskrit.

takkai Type of drum.

tāla (S) Cycle of beats in Indian classical music.

tamil The Tamil language; the three types of Tamil literature: prose and poetry, music, and drama.

Tāṇṭakam A hymn-type used by the Tēvāram poet Appar, set in the extended meter called tāṇṭakam.

tantra (S) Esoteric works related to the religion of the Āgamas; another word for Āgama.

Tirukkaṭaikkāppu "The sacred final protection," the signature verse with which Campantar ends his hymns.

Tirumular Author of the Tamil Śaiva text Tirumantiram.

Tirumurai Primary canonical text in the Tamil Śaiva sect.

Tirut tontat tokai The Tēvāram hymn in which Cuntarar names the Nāyaṇārs.

Tiruviruttam A genre of hymns composed by Appar and other Tamil tonțar "Servants," devotees.

tuți Type of drum.

Umā Name of Pārvatī, the Goddess, spouse of Śiva.

Vaisnava (S) Worshipper of Vișnu.

vannam Song with complex rhythms.

vanni Prosopis spicigera, the Suma tree.

vāram Type of song.

Veda (S) The four Vedas; see śruti.

Vellala Tamil "vēļālar"; general term for a group of high-ranking nonbrahmin castes in Tamilnadu.

vēnkai The kino tree.

vimāņa The tower of the Hindu temple.

vīņā Stringed instrument.

vinai See karma.

viruttam A style of singing the Tēvāram hymns; a Tamil meter.

Viṣṇu (S) The preserver-god in the Hindu triad.

yāl Ancient Tamil stringed instrument.

yogi (S) One who practices yoga.

yökam Sanskrit yoga; meditative discipline, one of the four activities directed toward liberation in Śaiva Siddhānta theology.

Tamil Texts, by Title

Note: The Tirunelveli South Indian Saiva Siddhanta Works Publishing Society has been abbreviated as SISSW Publishing Society.

Akattiyar tēvārat tiraṭṭu: Mūlamum uraiyum. With glossary and commentary by Kayappākkam Catāciva Ceṭṭiyār. Madras: SISSW Publishing Society, 1925. June 1976 edition.

Cilappatikāram: Mūlamum uraiyum. The Cilappatikāram of Iļańkovațikaļ with the commentary of Po. Ve. Comacuntaranār. Madras:

SISSW Publishing Society, 1969. 1977 edition.

Cuntaramūrtti cuvāmikaļ aruļicceyta tēvārap patikankaļ (Periyapurāna murai). The Tēvāram Hymns of Saint Cuntaramūrtti. With a biographical essay and notes by A. Cōmacuntaram Ceṭṭiyār. Madras: Saiva Siddhānta Mahā Samājam, 1935. Cited in the notes as Cuntaramūrtti Tēvāram.

Kanta purāṇam. Śrī Kantapurāṇam. 2 volumes. Edited by A. Ramanathan. Retold by Rā. Sarasvati. Madras: Prema Press, 1974. 2nd edition, 1979.

Kāraikkāl ammaiyār patikankal. See Patinorān tirumurai.

Kāvirit tenkarait talankal. Madras: Tarumai Ātīnam Center Worship Society Publication. Madras, 1965.

Nālāyirat tivviyap pirapantam. The Hymns of the Āļvārs. Edition supervised by Annankarācārya Svāmikaļ. Madras: V. N. Devanathan, 1971.

Onpatām tirumurai. Tirumurai IX. Containing the Tiruvicaippā and Tiruppallāntu of Tirumāļikaittēvar and others. Tarumapuram: Tarumapuram Ātīṇam, 1969.

Panniru tirumuraip peruntirattu. An anthology of hymns from the Twelve Tirumurai. Edited by Pa. Irāmanāta Pillai. Madras: SISSW

Publishing Society, 1961. 1980 edition.

Paripāṭal: Mūlamum uraiyum. Paripāṭal, with the commentary of Pō. Vē. Comacuntaraṇār. Madras: SISSW Publishing Society, 1957. 1975 edition.

Patiņorān tirumurai. Tirumurai XI. Composed by twelve saints. With notes by Cu. A. Irāmacāmip pulavar. Madras: SISSW Publishing Society, 1971.

Periya purāṇam. Tiruttoṇṭar mākkatai (or: Tirut toṇṭar purāṇam) of Cēkkilār. With historical notes by Pa. Irāmanāta Piḷḷai and textual notes by Cu. A. Irāmacāmip pulavar. Madras: SISSW Publishing Society, 1970.

Periya purāṇam. Tirut toṇṭar purāṇam eṇṇum periya purāṇam: Cēkkilār arulic ceytatu. 6 volumes. Edited with a commentary by C. K. Subramaniya Mutaliyār. Kōyamuttūr Tamil Sangam, 1937–1953. Second edition.

- Tēvāram. Volume One. Tirumurai I-III. Tirumānacampantar tēvārap patikankaļ. Edited by Kayappākkam Catāciva Ceţṭiyār. Madras: SISSW Publishing Society (Kalakam), 1927. 1973 edition. Cited in the notes as Tēvāram Kalakam edition.
- Tēvāram. Volume Two. Tirumurai IV-VII. Tirunāvukkaracar, Cuntaramūrtti tēvārap patikankaļ. Edited by Kayappākkam Catāciva Ceṭṭiyār. Madras: SISSW Publishing Society (Kalakam), 1928–1929. 1973 edition. Cited in the notes as Tēvāram Kalakam edition.
- Tēvāram. (Paņmurai). Tirumurai I-VII. Tiruñānacampantar, Tirunāvuk-karacar, Cuntaramūrtti Tēvāram. Published in seven volumes with commentary by various scholars. Tarumapuram: Tarumapuram Ātīṇam, 1953-1964. Cited in the notes as Tēvāram Ātīṇam edition.
- Tēvāram: Hymnes Śivaïtes du pays tamoul. Volume I. Nāṇacampantar. Edited by T. V. Gopal Iyer. General Editor: François Gros. Publications de l'Institut français d'indologie no. 68.1. Pondicherry: Institut français d'indologie, 1984. Cited in the notes as Tēvāram Pondicherry edition.
- Tēvāram: Hymnes Sivaïtes du pays tamoul. Volume II. Appar et Cuntarar. Edited by T. V. Gopal Iyer. General Editor: François Gros. Publications de l'Institut français d'indologie no. 68.2. Pondicherry: Institut français d'indologie, 1985. Cited in the notes as Tēvāram Pondicherry edition.
- Tirumantiram. Tirumurai X. The Tirumantiram of Tirumūlar. 2 volumes. With a commentary by Pa. Irāmanāta Piļļai and notes by A. Citamparanār. Madras: SISSW Publishing Society, 1942. 1975 edition.
- Tiruvācakam and Tirukkovaiyār. The Tiruvācakam and Tirukkovaiyār of Māṇikkavācakar. Tirumurai VIII, with notes. Tarumapuram: Tarumapuram Ātīṇam, 1966.
- Tiruvilaiyāṭar purāṇam. The Tiruvilaiyāṭarpurāṇam of Parañcōti Munivar. With a glossary. Madras: SISSW Publishing Society, 1931. 1979 edition.

Umāpaticivam tēvāra aruļmurait tirattu. With the commentary of Pa. Irāmanāta Piļļai. Madras: SISSW Publishing Society, 1961.

Vāļkkaiyil tirumuraikaļ (The Tirumurai Texts in Life). Edited by Ce. Cuntaran. Madras: Puracait Tirunerik Kalakam, 1973.

Secondary Sources in Tamil, by Author

- Bhāskarat Toṇṭaimāṇ, To. Mu. Vēnkaṭam mutal kumari varai. 4 volumes. Tirunelveli: S. R. Subramaniya Pillai, 1960–1967. Reprint, 1967.
- Cenkalvarāya Piļļai, Va. Cu. Tēvāra oļineri: Campantar. 2 volumes. Madras: SISSW Publishing Society, 1946, 1950. Reprint, 1963.
- Tēvāra oļineri: Cuntarar. Madras: SISSW Publishing Society, 1963.
- Cuppiramaniya Pillai, Ta. Civastala mancari. Madras: Tiruppati Shri Mahantu Press, 1931. 3rd edition.
- Cuppu Rețțiyar, Na. Tonțai nățțut tiruppatikal. Tirunelveli: S. R. Subramaniya Pillai, 1973.
- -----. Pānṭi nāṭṭut tiruppatikaļ. Tirunelveli: S. R. Subramaniya Pillai, 1977.
- Irācamāņikkanār, Mā. Periya purāņa ārāycci. Madras: Pāri Nilaiyam, 1948. 3rd edition, 1978.
- Irāmanātan Cettiyār, Lē. Pa. Ka., ed. Paņ ārāycciyum atan muţivukaļin tokuppum. Compiled by Pe. Tūran. Madras: Tamil Icaic Cankam, 1974.
- Kaliyāņacuntara Tēcikar, A. "Tarumaiy ātīnak kuruparamparai varalāru." Makākumpāpiṣēka Viļā Malar, 338—466. Tarumapuram: Vaidyanāthasvāmi Devasthānam, 1970.
- Murukavēļ, Na. Rā. Meykanta nūlkaļin vāļviyal uņmaikaļ; tirumuraikalin cirappu. Tirukkaļukkunram: Kurukulam, 1973.
- ——. Tirumuraic celumalar: Tokuppum viļakkamum. Kārttikai Tīpam publication. Madras: Kāraņīśvarar Temple, Caitait Tēvāra Capai, 1975.
- Națēca Kavunțar, Ku. Appar varalārrarāycciyum tēvārat tiranāyvum. Madras: SISSW Publishing Society, 1972.
- Samy, B. L. Canka ilakkiyattil cetikoti vilakkam. Madras: SISSW Publishing Society, 1967. 1982 edition.
- . Canka ilakkiyattil pullina vilakkam. Madras: SISSW Publishing Society, 1976.
- Subramaniyam, Nīlāmbāļ, ed. Āļvārkaļum nāyanmārkaļum. Madras: Jayashree, 1966.

Turaicāmip Pilļai, Auvai Cu. Caiva ilakkiya varalāņu (ki. pi. 7 mutal 10 m nūrrāņtu varai). Annamalainagar: Annamalai University, 1958. 2nd edition, 1978.

Veļļaivāraņan, Ka. Panniru tirumurai varalāru: Mutal ēļu tirumuraikaļ.

Annamalainagar: Annamalai University, 1972.

Vipulananta Cuvamikal. Yalnūl: A Treatise on Ancient Tamil Music. Tanjore: Karantai Tamil Sangam, 1974.

Works in Other Languages

Agrawala, V. S. Śiva-Mahādeva. Varanasi, 1966.

Appadurai, Arjun. Worship and Conflict under Colonial Rule: A South Indian Case. Cambridge South Asian Studies 27. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1981.

Apte, V. S. The Practical Sanskrit-English Dictionary. 3rd edition, revised and enlarged. Delhi: Motilal Banarsidass, 1965. First published 1912.

Balasubrahmanyam, S. R. Early Chola Temples. Delhi: Orient Longman, 1971.

. Middle Chola Temples. Delhi: Thomson Press, 1975. Later Chola Temples. Delhi: Mudgala Trust, 1979.

Barrett, Douglas. Early Cola Architecture and Sculpture, 866–1014. London: Faber, 1974.

Bhandarkar, R. G. Vaisnavism, Saivism and Minor Religious Systems. Strasbourg: Karl J. Trübner, 1913.

Carpenter, J. Estlin. Theism in Medieval India. 1921. Reprint. Delhi: Munshiram Manoharlal, 1977.

Chatterji, J. C. Kashmir Shaivism. Srinagar, 1914.

Chidambaranatha Chettiar, A. Advanced Studies in Tamil Prosody. Annamalainagar: Annamalai University, 1977.

Clothey, Fred W., and J. Bruce Long, eds. Experiencing Siva: Encounters with a Hindu Deity. Columbia, Mo.: South Asia Books, 1983.

Coomaraswamy, Ananda K. "The Dance of Shiva." In The Dance of Shiva: Fourteen Indian Essays, 66-78. New York: Noonday Press, 1957. Revised ed. 1962.

Courtright, Paul. "On This Holy Day in My Humble Way: Aspects of Pūjā." In Gods of Flesh, Gods of Stone, 33-50. See Waghorne and Cutler 1985.

Curtis, J.W.V. "Space Concepts and Worship Environment in Saiva Siddhanta." In Experiencing Siva, 87-101. See Clothey and Long 1983.

Cutler, Norman Joel. Songs of Experience: The Poetics of Tamil Devotion. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1986.

Daniélou, Alain. Vedic Recitation and Chant: The Music of India. Rec-

- ord no. 6. UNESCO collection, A Musical Anthology of the Orient. Kassel/Basel: Bärenreiter.
- Devasenapathy, V. A. Saiva Siddhanta. Madras: University of Madras, 1958.
- -. Of Human Bondage and Divine Grace. Sivajñāna Siddhiyār Endowment Lectures, 1959. Annamalainagar: Annamalai University, 1963.
- Dhavamony, Mariasusai. Love of God according to Saiva Siddhanta: A Study in the Mysticism and Theology of Saivism, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1971.
- Dorai Rangaswamy, M. A. The Religion and Philosophy of Tēvāram; with Special Reference to Nampi Ārūrar (Sundarar). 4 volumes in 2 books. Madras: University of Madras, 1958-1959.
- Eck, Diana L. Darsan: Seeing the Divine Image in India. Chambersburg, Pa.: Anima Books, 1981.
- Eliade, Mircea. The Sacred and the Profane: The Nature of Religion. Translated from the French by Willard R. Trask. New York: Harper & Row, 1959.
- Filliozat, Jean. "The Role of the Śaivāgamas in the Śaiva Ritual System." In Experiencing Siva, 81-86. See Clothey and Long 1983.
- Fuller, Charles J. Servants of the Goddess: The Priests of a South Indian Temple. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984.
- Gargi, Balwant. Folk Theater of India. Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1966.
- Gerow, Edwin A Glossary of Indian Figures of Speech. The Hague: Mouton, 1971.
- Gonda, Jan. On Names and the Name of God in Ancient India. Verhandelingen der Koningklijke Nederlandse Akademie van Wetenschappen. Letterkunde. Nieuwe Reeks, vol. 75, no. 4. Amsterdam, 1970.
- -. Medieval Religious Literature in Sanskrit. A History of Indian Literature. Volume II, fasc. 1. Wiesbaden: Otto Harrassowitz, 1977.
- -. "The Satarudrīya." In Sanskrit and Indian Studies, 75-91. See Nagatomi et al. 1980.
- Government of India Census 1961. Volume IX: Tamil Nadu. Part XI-D: Temples of Tamil Nadu. Volume VII (i): Thanjavur. By K. Chockalingam. Thanjavur Temples, 1971.
- Hardgrave, Robert L. The Dravidian Movement. Bombay, 1965.
- Hardy, Friedhelm. "Ideology and Cultural Contexts of the Śrīvaiṣṇava Temple." In South Indian Temples, 119-51. See Stein 1978.
 - -. Viraha-Bhakti: The Early History of Krsna Devotion in South
- India. Delhi: Oxford University Press, 1983. Hart, George L., III. The Poems of Ancient Tamil: Their Milieu and Their

- Sanskrit Counterparts. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1975.
- -----. "The Nature of Tamil Devotion." In Aryan and Non-Aryan in India, edited by Madhav M. Deshpande and Peter E. Hook, 11–33. Michigan Papers on South and Southeast Asia, no. 14. Ann Arbor Center for South and South East Asian Studies, 1979.
- Princeton Library of Asian Translations. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1979.
- -----. "The Little Devotee: Cēkkilār's Story of Ciruttontar." In Sanskrit and Indian Studies, 217-36. See Nagatomi et al., 1980.
- Heifetz, Hank, trans. and ed. The Origin of the Young God: Kālidāsa's Kumārasaṃbhava. Translated, with annotation and an introduction. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1985.
- Herbert, George. "Jordan (1)" and "Jordan (2)." In Seventeenth Century Prose and Poetry, edited by Alexander M. Witherspoon and Frederick J. Warnke, pp. 849, 854. New York: Harcourt Brace and World, 1929. 2nd edition, 1963.
- Hopkins, Thomas J. The Hindu Religious Tradition. Encino, Calif.: Dickenson, 1971.
- Ingalls, Daniel H. H. An Anthology of Sanskrit Court Poetry: Vidyā-kara's Subhāṣitaratnakoṣa. Harvard Oriental Series, vol. 44. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1965.
- Jackson, William J. "Tyāgarāja: Musician Saint of South India." Ph.D. diss., Harvard University, 1984.
- Kailasapathy, K. Tamil Heroic Poetry. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1968.
- Karavelane, trans. Chants dévotionnels tamouls de Kāraikkālammaiyār. Edited and translated by Karavelane. Publications de l'Institut français d'indologie, no. 1. New edition. Pondicherry, 1982.
- Kingsbury, F., and G. E. Phillips. Hymns of the Tamil Saivite Saints. The Heritage of India Series. Calcutta: Association Press; London: Oxford University Press, 1921.
- Kramrisch, Stella. The Hindu Temple. Calcutta: University of Calcutta, 1946. 2 volumes. Reprint. Delhi: Motilal Banarsidass, 1976.
- -----. Manifestations of Siva. Philadelphia: Philadelphia Museum of Art, 1981.
- The Presence of Siva. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1981.
- Long, J. Bruce. "Rudra as an Embodiment of Divine Ambivalence in the

- Satarudrīya Stotram." In Experiencing Siva, 103-28. See Clothey and Long 1983.
- Lord, Albert B. The Singer of Tales. London, 1960.
- Lorenzen, David N. The Kāpālikas and Kālāmukhas: Two Lost Śaivite Sects. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1972.
- Mahalingam, T. V. Kañcīpuram in Early South Indian History, New York: Asia, 1969.
- Miller, Barbara Stoler, Love Song of the Dark Lord: Jayadeva's Gītagovinda. New York: Columbia University Press, 1977.
- -. "Kālidāsa's Verbal Icon: Astāmūrti Śiva." In Discourses on Śiva: Proceedings of a Symposium on the Nature of Religious Imagery, edited by Michael W. Meister. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1984.
- -, ed. and trans. Theater of Memory: The Plays of Kālidāsa. New York: Columbia University Press, 1984.
- Nagatomi, Masatoshi, B. K. Matilal, J. M. Masson, and E. C. Dimock, Ir., eds. Sanskrit and Indian Studies: Essays in Honor of Daniel H. H. Ingalls. Dordrecht: D. Reidel, 1980.
- Narayana Ayyar, C. V. Origin and Early History of Saivism in South India. Madras: University of Madras, 1939. Reprint, 1974.
- Narayanan, Vasudha. "Arcāvatāra: On Earth As He Is in Heaven." In Gods of Flesh, Gods of Stone, 53-66. See Waghorne and Cutler 1985.
- Natarajan, B. The City of the Cosmic Dance: Chidambaram. Southern Art Series 2. Delhi: Orient Longman, 1974.
- Nilakanta Sastri, K. A. The Colas. 2nd edition, revised. 2 volumes in 1. Madras: University of Madras, 1955.
- -. Development of Religion in South India. Madras: Orient Longmans, 1963.
- -. The Culture and History of the Tamils. Calcutta: Firma K. L. Mukhopadhyay, 1964.
- O'Flaherty, Wendy Donizer. Asceticism and Eroticism in the Mythology of Siva. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1973.
- an introduction. Harmondsworth: Penguin Books, 1975.
- Parry, Milman. Les Formulas et la métrique d'Homère. Paris, 1928.
- Peterson, Indira. "Singing of a Place: Pilgrimage as Metaphor and Motif in the Tēvāram Hymns of the Tamil Saivite Saints." Journal of the American Oriental Society 102, no. 1 (January-March 1982): 69-
- -. "Lives of the Wandering Singers: Pilgrimage and Poetry in Tamil Saivite Hagiography." History of Religions 22, no. 4 (1983): 338-60.

Peterson, Indira. "The kṛṭi as an Integrative Cultural Form: Aesthetic Experience in the Religious Songs of Two South Indian Composers." Journal of South Asian Literature 19, no. 2 (Fall-Winter 1984): 165–79.

----. "Sanskrit in Carnatic Music: The Songs of Muttusvāmi Dīkṣita."

Indo-Iranian Journal 29 (1986): 183-99.

. "In Praise of the Lord: The Image of the Royal Patron in the Songs of Saint Cuntaramurtti and the Composer Tyagaraja." In Patronage in Indian Culture, edited by Barbara Stoler Miller. Princeton: Princeton University Press, forthcoming.

Pope, G. U. The Tiruvāçagam or 'Sacred Utterances' of the Tamil Poet, Saint and Sage Māṇikkavāçagar. Tamil Text, Translation etc. Oxford: Clarendon, 1900. Reprint. Madras University, 1970.

Powers, Harold S. Essay I ("The region, its music and music history") and II ("Theory and practice of classical music) under "India, Subcontinent of." In The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, edited by Stanley Sadie. Vol. 9, 69–141. London: Macmillan, 1980.

- Raghavan, V. The Indian Heritage: An Anthology of Sanskrit Literature. Bangalore: Indian Institute of World Culture, 1956.
- Ramamurti, Rajam. "On the Themes of Divine Immanence and Localization." Tamil Civilization, Quarterly Research Journal of the Tamil University, Thanjavur (September 1983): 73–76.
- Ramanujan, A. K. The Interior Landscape: Love Poems from a Classical Tamil Anthology. UNESCO collection of representative works. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1967. Midland edition, 1975.
- ——. "Form in Classical Tamil Poetry." In Symposium on Dravidian Civilization, edited by Andrée F. Sjoberg. 73–105. Publication no. 1, Asian Series, Center for Asian Studies, University of Texas at Austin. General editors: Edgar C. Polomé et al. Austin and New York: Jenkins, 1971.
- -----. Speaking of Šiva. Baltimore: Penguin, 1973.

- ———. Poems of Love and War: From the Eight Anthologies and the Ten Long Poems of Classical Tamil. New York: Columbia University Press, 1985.
- Ramanujan, A. K., and Norman Cutler. "From Classicism to Bhakti." In Essays on Gupta Culture, edited by Bardwell L. Smith, 177–94. Columbia, Mo.: South Asia Books, 1983.
- Shulman, David D. Tamil Temple Myths: Sacrifice and Divine Marriage in the South Indian Saiva Tradition. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1980.

- Sivaramamurti, C. Națarāja in Art, Thought and Literature. Delhi: National Museum, 1974.
- . Śatarudrīya: Vibhūti of Śiva's Iconography. Delhi: Abhinav, 1976.
- Sivaraman, K. Śaivism in Philosophical Perspective: A Study of the Formative Concepts, Problems and Methods of Śaiva Siddhānta. Delhi: Motilal Banarsidass, 1973.
- Smith, Wilfred Cantwell. "The Study of Religion and the Study of the Bible." Journal of the American Academy of Religion 34, no. 2 (1971): 131-40.
- Somasundaram, P. S. Tirujñānasambandhar: Philosophy and Religion. Madras: Vani Pathippakam, 1986.
- Soundara Rajan, K. V. South Indian Temple Styles. Delhi: Munshiram Manoharlal, 1972.
- Spencer, George W. "The Sacred Geography of the Tamil Shaivite Hymns." Numen 17 (1970): 232-44.
- Staal, J. Frits. "Sanskrit and Sanskritization." Journal of Asian Studies 22, no. 3 (May 1963): 261-75.
- Stein, Burton. Peasant State and Society in Medieval India. Delhi: Oxford University Press, 1980.
- Subramaniam, T. N., ed. South Indian Temple Inscriptions. 3 volumes. Madras Government Oriental Series no. 157. Madras: Government Oriental Manuscripts Library, 1955–1957.
- Subrahmaniya Pillai, G. "Introduction and History of Śaiva Siddhānta." In Collected Lectures on Śaiva Siddhānta: 1946–1954. Tiruppanandal Endowment Lectures, Lecture 1. Annamalainagar: Annamalai University, 1965.
- Subramanyan, S. The Commonness in the Metre of the Dravidian Languages. Research Project Publication no. 22. Trivandrum: Dravidian Linguistics Association, 1977.
- Suddhananda Bharati, Yogi. The Grand Epic of Saivism. Tirunelveli/ Madras: SISSW Publishing Society, 1970.
- Tamil Lexicon. 6 volumes and supplement. Madras: University of Madras. 1936.
- Turner, Victor. The Ritual Process: Structure and Anti-Structure. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1969.
- Vatsyayan, Kapila. Traditional Indian Theater: Multiple Streams. New Delhi: National Book Trust, 1980.
- Venkatachari, K.K.A. The Manipravala Literature of the Śrīvaiṣṇava Ācāryas: 12th-15th Century A.D. Anantacharya Research Institute Series no. III. Bombay: Anantacharya Research Institute, 1980.

366

- Venkataramanayya, N. An Essay on the Origin of the South Indian Temple. Madras: Methodist Publishing House, 1930.
- Waghorne, Joanne P., and Norman Cutler, in association with Vasudha Narayanan, eds. Gods of Flesh, Gods of Stone: The Embodiment of Divinity in India. Chambersburg, Pa.: Anima, 1985.
- Warder, A. K. Indian Kāvya Literature. Volume 3. Delhi: Motilal Banarsidass, 1977.
- Yocum, Glenn E. "Shrines, Shamanism and Love Poetry: Elements in the Emergence of Popular Tamil Bhakti." Journal of the American Academy of Religion 41, no. 1 (March 1973): 3–17.
- -----. "Sign and Paradigm: Myth in Tamil Śaiva and Vaiṣṇava bhakti Poetry." In Structural Approaches to South India Studies, edited by Harry M. Buck and Glenn E. Yocum, 184–206. Chambersburg, Pa.: Anima Books, 1974.
- -----. Hymns to the Dancing Śiva: A Study of Māṇikkavācakar's Tiruvācakam. New Delhi: Heritage, 1982.
- Young, Katherine K. Beloved Places (Ukantaruļiņanilankaļ): The Correlation of Topography and Theology in the Śrīvaiṣṇava Tradition of South India. Delhi: Motilal Banarsidass, 1984.
- Younger, Paul. "Singing the Tamil Hymn book in the Tradition of Rāmānuja: The Adyayanotsava Festival in Śrīrankam." History of Religions 20, no. 2 (February 1982): 272–93.
- Zelliot, Eleanor. "The Medieval Bhakti Movement in History: An Essay on the Literature in English." In Hinduism: New Essays in the History of Religions, edited by Bardwell L. Smith, 143-168. Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1976.
- Zvelebil, Kamil V. The Smile of Murugan: On Tamil Literature of South India. Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1973.
- ——. Tamil Literature. In A History of Indian Literature. Jan Gonda Volume X, fasc. 1. Wiesbaden: Otto Harrassowitz, 1974.
- ------. Tamil Literature. In Handbuch der Orientalistik. Zweite Abteilung, Indien. Edited by Jan Gonda. Band 2: Literatur und Bühne, Abschnitt 1. Leiden/Cologne: E. J. Brill, 1975.

INDEX OF POEMS

The poems are numbered according to the Kalakam edition of the Tēvāram.

10000
Tēvāram 1	Tēvāram I
(Campantar)	(Campantar)
1.1: 270–71	89.3; 257
1.1, 3, 5: 246–47	92.1, 2: 272
4.11: 150	98.1: 108
5.2, 5–7: 163–64	99.1, 4-7, 10: 171-72
6.1, 3, 5, 9, 10: 191–92	100.9; 127
8.1, 2: 153–54	101.7; 203
10.1, 2: 166	129.11; 266
12.1-3: 167-68	130.1-3, 7, 8, 10: 164-6
12.7: 183–84	131.9: 195
12.10: 168	132.1: 129
	132.9: 190
16.6: 110–11	134.4: 112–13
35.3: 257–58	134.5: 119
39.1: 118	20 1130 121
40.1: 123	Tēvāram li
43.3, 8: 166–67	(Campantar)
45.1: 203	138.1-3, 6: 123-24
45.12: 158–59	140.1–3, 11: 107–8
46.1–11: 120–22	142.4: 212–13
48.7: 197–98	147.1: 110
50.7: 251–52	148.1: 109–10
52.3: 128–29	150.3: 263
53.4: 194–95	150.4: 267
59.1, 5, 6, 10: 156–57	154.1-3, 7-11: 248-50
60.1, 10: 245–46	173.1: 272
63.1, 2: 193	175.1, 2, 4: 159–60
64.1: 181	176.3, 4: 255
69.1–11: 168–71	176.6: 239–40
71.5: 183	177.1: 264
71.7: 104	177.3: 256
72.8: 130	179.2: 198
73.8: 104–5	183.1-11: 186-89
75.1–11: 138–41	184.7, 9: 193-94
77.1: 105	192.5: 182-83
80.1: 190–91	202.1, 11: 277
80.7: 154	215.1, 2: 252-53
81.1: 190	221.1: 109
82.1: 181	242.1: 265
86.7: 257

	rgs - gg b
Tevaram II	Têváram IV
(Campantar)	(Appar)
242,2; 263	21.1-10: 184-86
242.11: 266	23.1, 6, 8–10: 232–33
246.1–3; 162–63	30.2: 110
	31.4: 180
Tevaram III	31.9: 128
(Campantar)	39.1–5, 7: 286–87
268.2: 198	39.10: 129–30
279.1: 213	46.1, 2: 251
280.1: 218	48.1, 3: 113–14
282.2: 271	48.4: 197
284.1, 6, 7: 180-81	48.7: 114 49.1: 202
297.1, 2, 4, 11: 277-78	49.3, 4, 6, 7: 327–28
303.1: 228	49.8: 201–2
305.1, 4, 5, 10, 11: 278–79	49.9: 328
307.1-5: 217-18	50.1; 129
309.1, 3, 11: 276–77	50.2: 183
312.1: 281	52.1, 2: 253
327.1–11: 172–76	54.5, 7: 253-54
329.1: 265	54.8: 112
333.1: 180	54.9: 254
335.6: 196–97	57.1: 213
345.1, 11: 280	61.1, 3, 4, 6, 10: 199–200
366.1, 3, 11: 279–80 376.3, 9: 195–96	65.3, 6: 326–27
378,1–11; 273–76	65.9: 200
383.1: 281–82	69.1: 252
363,1; 261-62	70.4: 209–10
Tévāram IV	73.1–8, 10: 136–38
(Appar)	75.1, 4, 6, 7: 226–27
	76.2, 4: 211–12
1.1, 2, 4–7, 9, 10: 283–86	77.3: 265–66
2,6: 119	79.1, 4: 224
3.1–3, 10: 300–301	80.1: 120 80.2, 3: 106–7
4.8: 115	80.10: 130
5,1-10: 289-92	81.4: 118
6.1–3: 247–48 8.1: 109	81.5: 255
8.10: 105	81.10: 223
9.7, 8: 256	82.4, 7: 222
11.1, 2: 218	92.9: 120
14.1–11: 132–36	95.1: 214
15.1–11: 214–16	95.2: 222
19.5: 151	95.6: 228
19.11: 131	95.9: 223
20.1: 226	97.1: 222
20.3: 182	97.3: 252
20.6: 256	98.7: 326
20.10: 127	100.1: 289
20.20: 256-57	100.4: 201

Tëvāram IV	Tēvāram V
(Appar)	(Appar)
100.6: 228	209.1-11: 259-61
102.1-5: 287-89	213.1–10: 261–62
103.1: 254
103.2: 325	Tēvāram VI
103.3: 265	(Appar)
103.4: 325	216.1, 2: 151–52
103.5: 239	223.1–3, 5, 8, 9: 124–26
103.6: 325	229.1–3, 5, 7, 8, 11: 115–17
103.10: 243	239.7: 245
108.1: 197	239.10: 151
110.1, 2, 10: 221	243.1: 114
113.1: 103	247.1: 149–50
113.4: 225	261.1: 115
113.6: 209	268.8; 200
113.8: 236	272.1, 3, 7, 8: 152–53
113.9: 225	301.1: 112
113.10: 224–25	305.1: 236–37
114.1: 103	307.7: 104
114.10: 236 121.1: 119	308.1, 3: 113
121.1: 119	309.1: 213
Tēvāram V	309.5: 149
(Appar)	309.10: 263–64
	310.1, 3, 5, 9: 131–32 312.1–10: 293–96
124.1, 7, 11: 297–98	313.1: 301
125.1, 5, 6: 150–51	313.11.301
128.1: 182	Tēvāram VII
128.6, 10: 210	(Cuntarar)
129.1: 180	1.1: 303
131.2: 210	5.1–10: 233–35
133.1: 182 133.9: 239	9.6: 325–26
135.1: 209	14.1, 2, 6, 9–12: 237–39
135.4: 212	15.1–10: 228–31
135.8: 258	17.1, 2, 7, 11: 304
157.1–5, 9, 10: 155–56	20.1, 3, 4, 6-8, 10: 313-15
161.1, 6: 154–55	21.1, 6: 240
161.11: 240	22.3: 258
162.3, 6, 7: 258–59	23.2: 240–41
164.1-5, 7-10: 298-99	24.1: 103-4
171.1: 226	24.2, 3: 231
174.1-7, 10: 219-20	32.1–10: 176–78
177.2: 210	34.1–5, 8, 11: 317–19
177.6: 289	39.1–11: 331–36
177.8: 258	41.3: 149
186.7: 296	43.11: 266–67 46.1, 4, 5, 7, 8, 10, 11: 315–17
204.1: 209	47.1, 2, 4: 160–61
204.9: 262–63	48.1-3: 220-21
204.10: 212	49.1–3, 7: 178–79
207.5–7: 211

Teváram VII (Cuntarat) 51.1-3: 225-26 51.9, 10: 306 54.1, 2, 4, 9, 10: 306-8 55.2-4: 330 58.1-6, 10: 241-43 61.10: 201 62.5: 303 62.8: 323-24 65.1, 2: 329 67.5: 324 69.1, 3, 6-8: 308-9 Tēvāram VII (Cuntarar) 69.10: 202 78.1, 6: 158 78.10: 324 84.1, 5: 106 88.8: 324 89.1-3, 6, 9, 10: 309-10 90.1, 4, 5, 9, 10: 243-44 92.8: 312 95.1-3, 5-7, 11: 311-12 98.10, 11: 196 100.1-10: 320-22

GENERAL INDEX

Accirupākkam, 56, 105, 159 Agamas, 11, 18, 56, 200, 277n, 278, 322; fourfold classification of religious activity in, 45; iconography of Siva in, 95; relationship between Vedas, Tamil hymns, and, 53, 57; revelation of Siva in, 132; ritual manuals, 60; tradition of, 44, 55, 95 Ahalya, 203n Ainkurunūru, 76 Airāvata: elephant of Indra, 194, 320n Aiyāru (Tiruvaiyāru), 14, 37, 38, 120, 129-30, 146, 160, 164-66, 212, 215, 286-87, 297, 300 Aiyatikal Kātavarkon, See Pallava kings akam poetry, 30, 33, 36, 38, 39, 244n; hero and heroine in, 245n, 246n, 247n, 248n; Kuruntokai anthology, 30, 30n, 37, 166n; landscapes in, 36, 41, 147-48, 247 Akattiyar tēvārat tirattu, 86 Äkkūr, 153 Ālaṅkāṭu (Paļaiyaṇūr Ālaṅkāṭu), 158, 159n, 203 Ālanturai. See Puļamankai Ālavāy. See Madurai Ālvārs: Tamil Vaiṣṇava saints, 4, 6, 39, 57, 58. See also Āņṭāļ; Nālāyirat tivviyap pirapantam; Nammāļvār; Pūtam; Tirumaṅkai Ālvār Amarnīti Nāyaṇār, 326, 331 Ämättür, 124–26, 146 Ampar, 196n Anaikkā, 159n, 214; legend of spider turned king at, 147, 196n, 326n, 327, 328 Änaimalai, 277n, 278 Añcaikkalam: Cēra capital, 146, 319-20 Annāmalai, 81, 82, 89, 90, 159, 205n, 216; hill shrine, 34, 35, 147, 166, 168-71; Siva as linga of fire at, 205n Antal: akam themes in poems of, 39n

Apasmāra-purusa. See muyalakan

Appar (Tirunāvukkaracar): addressed as "father" by Campantar, 20, 296; and Appūti Nāyaņār, 297; association with Atikai Vīrattāņam, 131, 146, 283; author of enormous number of songs, 329; born Marunīkkiyār, 283; confrontation of, with Jain monks, 19, 217n, 292-96; early life of, 283; illness of, 19, 131, 221n, 283-86; journey of, to Kailāsa, 297; life of, 19-20, 283-301; and miracle of gold coin at Vīlimilalai, 297, 298n; and miracle of temple door at Magaikkāţu, 297-99; miracles in the life of, 292-93, 296-97; mystical vision of, in Tiruvaiyāru, 297, 300-301; named Nāvukkaracar by Šiva, 3, 20, 283; past as a Jain monk, 19, 130n, 132, 136, 207, 217n, 283, 284n, 286-92; pilgrimages, 296-97; and Rāvaņa, 130n; service in temples, 20; specialist in Tāņţakam form, 82; union of, with Siva, 297, 301; Vellala background of, 19-20 Āppāti, 113-14, 146, 159, 197 Appūti Nāyanār, 297, 333 Ari. See Vișnu Arivāttāya Nāyaņār, 331n, 332 Arjuna: exemplar of skill in arms, 317n, 318. See also Saiva myth Arunanti Civācāriyār, 54n; Civañānapōtam of, 227n Astămūrti. See Siva Atikai Vīraţţāṇam, 35n, 119-22, 147, 159n, 215, 293; Appar and, 131, 146, 283-86 Ātirai. See Tiruvātirai atiyar: and acts of devotion, 42-46; devotee, 42, 48, 98 Attavīrattāņam. See sacred places: eight Vīrattānam shrines Avatuturai, 115, 159n, 213, 297 Avūrp Pacupatiyīccaram, 153-54 Avan. See Brahma

Bhagavad Gitā (Bhagavadgītā), 4n, 25, 25n, 52, 115n

Bhagavata Purāņa, 87n

bhakti: and artistic creativity in ōtuvār performance, 72–74; cults, and Buddhists and Jains, 10–11; cults, in Tamil region, 9–11; defined, 4, 6, 9, 42, 52; and devotional kṛti, 59n; as expressed in Tēvāram hymns, 47–50, 205–8; hymns, 23, 24n, 29, 30, 32; image worship and temples in, 11–12; as sacrifice, 212; senses as obstacles to, 233, 251–54; in Tamil (early) devotional texts, 43; in Tamil civilization and religion, 4, 4n, 6, 8, 9, 11– 13, 23, 24, 29, 31, 32, 36–38

Bhīma: exemplar of physical strength, 317n, 318

Brahmā, 32; emerged from Viṣṇu's navel, 127; four-headed god, 122, 178, 189, 192, 193, 195; giver of Yedas, 127, 153, 193, 202; God with lotus-seat, 127, 155, 158, 189, 193, 194, 232, 246, 257; the Grandfather, 193; worshipper of Śiva, 202, 246

brahmins, 8, 20, 25, 44, 140, 182, 190–92, 272, 281, 316; Ādiśaiva, 44n, 302; alliance of, with peasants, 10, 44; and Nāyaṇārs, 44; Smārta, 44n, 55, 56; in the Tamil region, 44n, 52, 54; of Tillai (Chidambaram), 106n, 107, 331; and Vedic recitation, 56, 190–92, 335. See also Sanskrit language: Sanskritization; Vedas

Buddhism in the Tamil region, 8–11. See also Buddhist monks

Buddhist monks, 10, 12, 20, 136n, 157, 165, 172, 231, 244, 259, 276; in Campantar's . ,mns, 141, 157, 164, 168, 170, 172, 175, 189, 192, 248n, 249; hostility of Śaiva saints toward, 10–12, 20

Caiva Ellappa Nävalar: Arunaikkalampakam of, 21n, 269

Cākkiya Nāyaṇār: "Buddhist" Śaiva saint, 327n, 328, 333

Campantar (Tiruñāṇanacampantar): accompanied by Pāṇar musician, 20; and brahmin connections, 20, 44, 270; and controversy with Jain and Buddhist monks in Madurai, 11, 20, 22, 273–80; fire ordeal of, 273, 280; and gift of divine wisdom, 20, 108, 139n, 141, 270–71; and gift of gold coin from Śiva, 271–72; and gift of golden cymbals, 20, 271, 324; in iconography, 20; and miracle of temple door at Maraikkāţu, 272; miracles of, 20, 271–72; and miraculous cure of Pandyan king, 273, 276–77; named "Āļuṭaiya Piļļaiyār," 270; pilgrimages of, 20, 271; and Vedic learning, 20, 139, 141; water ordeal of, 273, 281n; wedding of, and final union, 21, 281–82

Cankam poetry, 3, 8n, 23, 24, 27, 31, 33, 38, 41, 102, 293n; anthologies, 76; chieftain Pāri as exemplary patron in, 39, 317n, 318; classification of themes in, 33; language of, 83, 90; oral tradition and formulas, 84; prosody, 77–78; syncopation in, 85. See also akam poetry; Cankam poets and bards; meters, classical Tamil; puram poetry

Cankam poets and bards, 23n, 24, 34, 84,

147; as devotees of Siva, 331n

Cańkili (wife of Cuntarar), 21, 302, 305, 310, 317; Cuntarar blinded by Śiva to please, 308; as Śiva's gift, 310

Canțicar, 100, 137, 208, 239; association with Āppāți and Cēyñalūr, 147, 197–98; exemplary Nāyaṇār, 35, 46–47; and gift of ambrosial food, 327, 329; honored with Śiva's garland, 197, 327, 329; and worship of linga, 47, 197, 327, 330, 332

cariyai, 45-46; examples of, 259-61, 265-

Carnatic music, 59, 62; rāga ālāpana in, 63; rāga and tāla in, 61, 62; Telugu lyrics in, 74, 74n. See also rāga scale-type

Cațaiyanăr: father of Cuntarar, 336. See also Cuntarar: son of Cațaiyan

Cattimurram, 222, 252

Cāykkāru, 147, 200, 256, 264, 326–27 Cēkkiļār: author of Periya purāņam, 14, 17, 19, 47–49, 144n, 281n, 302, 321, 326, 331n; Cēkkiļārnāyaṇār purāṇam, biography of, 17n

Cenkāṭṭankuṭi: Kaṇapatiyīccaram in, 147, 191-92

Cēra, 8, 21, 77, 181; capital at Añcaikkalam, 319-20; kingdom (Malaināṭu), 8n, 13, 146. See also Cēramāņ Perumāļ Nāyaņār

Cēai, 136-38

Cēramān Perumāļ Nāyaṇār (Kaļarirrarivār) (Cēra king): author of Ponvaṇṇattantāti, 331n, 334; and Cuntarar, in Tanjore temple paintings, 320n; friendship of, with Cuntarar, 21, 178n, 319, 320

Cēyňalūr, 147, 197

Chidambaram (Tillai), 13, 20, 118, 144, 146–47, 151–52, 184n, 190, 296; brahmins of, 44, 44n, 106n, 107, 190n; Cirrampalam or Little Ampalam in, 99, 120, 130, 145, 154, 159, 191, 214, 223, 232–33, 243–44, 255; discovery of Tēvāram hymns in the temple at, 15–16; Kaṇampulla Nāyaṇār and, 327n; known as Kōyil, 16, 106n; Periya purāṇam inaugurated at, 144n

Cilappatikāram: dances in, 99; ecstatic religious practices in, 43n; ode to Kaveri, 38n; Sanskritization in, 8; songs and meters in, 21–22, 77–79; as Tamil national epic, 10; vāram genre in, 21–22

Cirāppaļļi, 108, 160, 215

Cirkāļi (Kāļi) [also known as Canpai, Cirapuram, Kaļumalam, Koccaivayam, Piramapuram, Pukali, Pūntarāy, Puravam, Tōṇipuram, Veṅkuru and Vēṇupuram], 20, 50, 59n, 67, 68–69, 72n, 74, 108, 110, 122, 139–41, 145–47, 150, 171, 176n, 180, 190, 195, 222, 239–41, 245–46, 254, 266, 270–71, 276–77, 278, 280, 282, 296; birthplace of Campantar, 20, 270; many names of, 145, 193; more than seventy hymns by Campantar about, 146

Ciruttonta Nāyaṇār (Pallava minister), 19n, 47n, 191n, 331n; of Cenkāṭṭaṅkuṭi, 334

Civapātavirutayar: father of Campantar, 270, 280

Civapuram, 69-72, 112

classical Tamil civilization, 3–4, 8, 24, 98; and the Cankam age, 8, 13, 23, 76n; public worship in, 145. See also Cankam poetry; meters, classical Tamil; Tamil kingdoms

Cola, 8, 13, 14, 39, 44n, 54, 55n, 145, 181, 190, 196, 233n; bronzes of Națarāja, 99; inscriptions, 21; king, 276; kingdom (Cōlanāru), 8n, 13, 51, 146, 231, 328; king Kulottunga III, patron of Śaivism, 15–16; king Pukal Cōlan, 334; kings in Tirut tonṭat tokai, 321; patronage of Śaivism, 13–16; princess Mankaiyarrkaraci, 274; temples, 144, 320n; temple sculpture and bronzes, Śiva in, 96, 99n. See also Kōccenkan cosmic flood: myth of, 35, 68, 72, 139, 145, 194-96, 241, 246n, 247

Cuntarar (Cuntaramūrtti Nāyaṇār): ascent of, to Kailasa on white elephant, 319-22; association of, with Ceraman Perumal Nāyanār, 319; blindness of, 305, 306n, 307-12; as bondservant of Siva, 235, 238, 302-4, 307, 309, 331-36; as citizen of Navalūr and Ārūr (Ūran, Ārūraņ, Nampi Ārūrar), 161, 235, 239, 241, 243-44, 264, 302-3, 304, 307, 312, 317, 322, 324, 331-36; conversion of, in Venneynallür, 237n, 242n, 302-4, 309, 311; father of Cinkati, 161, 196, 231, 302; as father of Vanappakai, 319; and gift of Cinkati and Vanappakai from Kötpuli Nāyaṇār, 302; as handsome lord (Cuntaramūrtti), 302, 313; hymns of Campantar and Appar in, 30n, 321-24; Icaiñani, mother of, 302, 336; in iconography, 21; life of, 21, 302-18; and list of devotees in Tirut tontat tokai, 321, 331-36; the Lord's Comrade, 306, 319, 322; marriage of, to Cankili and Paravai, 302, 305-6; miracles in the life of, 319; as philanthropist, in the company of Paravai, 313; and requests for material wealth, from Siva, 34n, 313-19, 324; "Rude Devotee" (vanrontan), 207, 303, 304, 307, 319; son of Cataiyanār, 161, 196, 243, 302, 319; upbringing of, as adopted son of Pallava feudatory, 302; as Vedic scholar, 307

cuttärikam style. See viruttam dance of Śiva, 28-31, 34, 118-22, 134, 163, 171, 177, 191-92, 213, 232-33, 243, 255, 324; in the burning-ground, 69, 102, 119, 176, 191, 220, 228, 229; koţukoţţi, 99, 119; pāṇi, 99; pāṇṭaran-kam, 99; patutam, 99, 119, 121. See also Chidambaram; Cirrampalam in; gaṇas of Śiva; Śiva

Death (Dharma, Kâla, Yama), 221, 235, 253; Ender, 220; henchmen of, 155, 207, 218, 223, 243—44; the King, 296; as supervisor of retribution, 206n, 243. See also Saiva myth: Mārkandeya Drāvida Munnerrak Kalakam (DMK)

party, 41n

drums: koţukoţţi, 119, 139; kuṭamulā, 139; montai, 120; mulavam (mulavu), 29, 120; paṭai, 185, 285; takkai, 97, 140; tuţi, 119, 132. See also dance of Siva: koṭukoţţi

Enâtinăta Nâyaṇār, 321, 332

Erukkattampuliyār, 257

Erumpiyūr, 236–37

Ēyarköŋ Kalikkāma Nâyaṇār: enemy of Cuntarar, 330n, 332n; landowner, 330;

prince of Ēyars, 330, 338

ganas (spirit hosts) of Śiwa, 98, 101, 104, 104n, 122, 123, 320n; band of musicians for Śiwa, 98, 104, 119-20, 222; eight, 324; eighteen, 324; names of, 104 Gaņeša (Gaṇapati): son of Śiwa, 15-16, 101, 233

Gangaikondacolapuram, 144n, 327 Ganges River (Gangā), 29, 45, 97, 101n, 109, 118, 137, 140, 174, 208, 233, 241, 261, 264, 273, 310; as Šiva's wife, 177, 235, 313 garbhagtha, 60, 101, 144. See also temple: architecture of Gautama, 203n

Gitagovinda: kāvya and moric meters in, 65-66

Godavari River, 158

Goddess (Pārvatī, Umā): and Kāmakkōṭṭam shrine, 145, 233n, 234; Kāmākṣī of Kanchipuram, 201, 233n, 234; Mīnākṣī of Madurai, 193, 273; mother of Murukaṇ, 239; role of, in the Tēvāram, 101; as spouse and inseparable companion of Siva, 101, 105–6, 108, 111, 115, 121–22, 123, 135, 137, 140, 169, 170, 174, 177, 180, 214, 218, 227n, 229, 230–31, 234, 266, 279–80, 295, 297, 300–301, 308, 314 grace (arul) of the Lord, 18, 155, 197, 206, 212, 219, 226-27n, 234, 237-44, 266, 271; liberating, 168, 239, 241, 254; and Venneynallür Arutturai, shrine of, 303. See also karma; Śaiva Siddhānta theology hand-cymbals: kallavaţam, 106, 184n, 185; tāļam, 20, 61, 63, 271, 324 Harihara: form of Śiva-Viṣṇu, 131n, 132, 152n

Himalayan gods, 88, 89, 112, 125, 132, 134, 138, 169, 257, 276, 295

hymn-types in the Tēvāram: Kuruntokai, 82n, 211, 259; Nēricai, 65, 224; Tānṭakam, 32n, 49, 61, 61n, 69, 72, 82n, 111, 113, 114, 151, 263, 293; Tiruviruttam, 61-62

icai: music, 79; -tamiļ, 77n Iļankōvaṭikaļ: author of Cilappatikāram, 10

Indra: and Ahalyā, 203; king of gods, 185, 193, 194n, 200n; welcomes Cuntarar, 322

lnnampar, 209, 212, 258 Irāmāvatāram of Kampan. See Rāmāyaņa Irāmēccuram (Rameswaram), 198–99 Itaimarutūr, 180, 182, 190n, 210

Jainism in the Tamil region, 8–11; brahmin-peasant alliance and, 10; and devotional religion, 11; Tamil language and, 10; Tēvāram authors and, 19–20. See also Appar; Campantar

Jain monks, 10, 12, 20, 244, 249, 259, 273; ascetic practices of, invective against, 10, 122, 156n, 157, 168, 168n, 170, 172, 174, 189, 192, 278-80, 286-92; conversion of kings by, 12; described by Tēvāram poets as scoundrels and heretics, 136n, 141, 165, 231, 276, 277n, 278, 280, 281n, 287, 289-92, 296; as migrants from northern regions, 10; names of, 278; Śaiva saints' hostility toward, 10-11, 19-20; Tantiyatikal and, 276, 279, 329n; use of Sanskrit and Prakrit by, 10, 277n, 278. See also Appar; Campantar

Kaccūr Ālakkōyil, 149

Jalandhara, See Śaiva myth: Viṣṇu

Kaccūr Alakköyil, 149 Kailāsa, 98, 158n, 159, 165, 302; celestial abode of Śiva, 206n, 297, 319; Notittāņmalai, 320-22. See also Saiva myth: Rāvana and Kailāsa Kālī, 173, 203 Kālidāsa, 25, 28, 28n, 107; Kumārasambhava of, 28n, 96n; Raghuvamša of, 25n, 107n Kālatti (Kālahasti), 126, 159; hill landscape, 172-76; home of hunter-saint Kannappar, 147, 172n, 174, 327n Kalippālai, 110, 159, 240-41; neytal landscape, 246-47 Kalukkunru, 86, 159, 215 Kāmakkottam: shrine for Goddess, 145, 233n, 234 Kāmākşī. See Goddess Kampā River, 201n Kanampulla Nāyanār, 327, 328, 334 Kānappēr, 106, 160, 180-81, 214 Kanchipuram: Appar's confrontation with Jain monks at, 292-93; Cākkiya Nāyanar and, 327n; Cuntarar's vision restored at, 305; Kacci Ekampam shrine, 25, 59n, 109-10, 126, 147, 154, 201, 228, 233n, 234, 240, 258-59, 289; Kacci Mayanam shrine, 111; Kacci Mergaļi shrine, 240; Kāmakkottam (Goddess) shrine, 233n, 234; North Kacci, 159; Pallavas and, 9, 12, 13, 14n, 145, Kañci River, 244 Kaniyan Pünkungan, 293n Kannappar, the hunter-saint, 69-72, 112, 112n, 131, 208, 328, 329, 332; association of, with Kāļatti, 147, 172n, 174, 327n; exemplary Nāyaṇār, 35, 46-47, 100 Kannārköyil, 203 Kanrappūr, 154 Kanta purāņam, 98 Kantiyür, 104 Kānūr, 104-5, 214 Kāpālikas, 182 Kapilar: Cańkam poet, 38, 39 Kāraikkāl Ammaiyār Nāyaṇār, 4n, 24, 77; description of Śiva's dance by, 99; as gana of Śiva, 98n; Pey, 331n, 333 Karkuti: hill shrine, 159, 166-67 karma (vinai), 17-18, 116, 122, 205-6, 219, 227, 230, 256, 263, 309, 310, 321; deadly, binding, 168, 222; fear of evil, 237, 242; good, 256, 265; and rebirth,

156, 158, 231, 251n; release from, in Saiva Siddhanta, 206; Siva as destroyer of, 117, 168, 170, 210, 231, 241, 266, 279n, 289, 318; Siva as Lord who cannot be bound by, 225. See also grace; Saiva Siddhanta theology Karukāvūr, 115-17, 160, 215 Karukkuti, 213 Katampūr karakköyil, 160, 182, 239 Katantai, See Tünkanaimatam Katavūr Vīrattam, 42, 180, 254; Kalaya Nāyaṇār of, 332; site of Mārkaṇdeya's deliverance from Death, 128, 147, 196n kattalai: rule for hymn, 62-63, 79 Kāttuppalli, 39, 160, 163–64 Kātukilāl: forest goddess, 176n, 177 Kaundinya, 44, 270; gotra of Campantar, 44, 219n Kaveri River, 87n, 123n, 220, 221; agricultural landscape and, 39, 147, 162-66, 329; bathing in, 261; bathing Siva in water of, 227; Cola associations with, 3, 39, 39n, 196, 328, 329; Delta region, 35, 38, 39, 54, 55n, 147, 265 Kētāram, 158, 324 Ketilam River, 119, 196, 283-86 Kīlvēlūr, 317 Kirātārjunīya of Bhāravi, 25n kiriyai, 45-46 Köcceńkan (Köcceńkanan): Cóla king, 147, 196, 326-27, 335; spider reborn as, 328–30. See also Āņaikkā Kölakkä, 215, 303, 324 Kölili, 313-15, 324 Kollitam River, 229n Końku country, 151, 160, 244 Kötikkulakar (Point Calimere), 176-78 Kötpuli Nāyaṇār, 229n, 231, 335; father of Cińkati and Vanappakai, 229n, 302, 332n; of Nāṭṭiyattāṇkuṭi, 332n Kotuńkungu, 159 Kövalür Virattam, 252 Köyil. See Chidambaram kōyil. See temple; temples of Śiva Ksēttirat tiru venpā, 332n Kubera: god of wealth, 45, 263 Kulaccițai Năyanăr. See Pănțiya: minister Kulaccirai Nāyaņār Kumaran. See Murukan Kumari River, 158, 261

Kumbhakonam (Kutantai), 59n, 159, 215; Kutantaik kāronam, 130 Kunkiliyakkalaya Nāyanār, 331n, 332 Künpantiyan, See Ningacir Netumaran Kuntaiyür, 313-14 Kurankātuturai (Ten Kurankātuturai), 42, 210, 258, 289 Kuravai dance, 77 Kuravañci, 171 kuriñci (hill) landscape, 36, 37, 147, 167n, Kurrālak kuravanci, 171n Kurrālam, 146, 151, 152, 160, 215; hill landscape, 171-72 Kurukkai Virattam, 129, 183, 201-2, 327-28 Kurukşetra, 158 Kuruntokai. See akam poetry Kutantai. See Kumbhakonam

Lalgudi Swaminathan: ōtuvār at Kapāliśvara temple, 61n, 73
linga of Śiva, 28n, 47n, 127, 202n, 212, 250; Cuntarar's request to Śiva to leave, at Tiruvoṛṛiyūr temple, 305, 310; Goddess's worship of, in Kanchipuram, 201n; king Tonṭaimāṇ and, 202n; manifestation in, 259–61; manifest-unmanifest aspect of Śiva, 173n; mukha-, 47n; significance of, 101; in temple, 144; worshipped by Caṇṭīcar, 47, 197, 327, 332 localization of myths, 34–35 local myths (talapurāṇam), 34–35, 39, 72, 99, 101, 193–203, 246

Madhvācārya, 52n

culture, 60; interview with ōtuvār in, 61n, 73; Paṇ Research Conferences in, 58n; and Pradoṣa Pūjā festival, at Kapālišvara temple, 56n. See also Mylapore Madurai (Maturai): Campantar's confrontation with Jain monks in, 20–21, 272–80; Mīnākṣī, Goddess at, 193n, 273; Pāṇṭiya capital, 8n, 43n, 59, 59n, 144, 145, 193, 216, 228, 332n Mahābhārata, 25, 25n, 129n, 158n; heroes, as exemplars, 317n, 318 Mahāsivarātri. See Siva temple festivals Māl (Tīrumāl). See Viṣṇu Malapāti, 103–4, 146, 231

Madras: as center of contemporary Tamil

Māṇikkavācakar, 4n, 6, 18, 21n, 48, 101n, 245n; akam themes in Tirukkōvaiyār of, 39n. See also Tiruvācakam Māṇikuļi, 196–97

Mankaiyarkkaraci. See Pāṇṭiya: queen Mankaiyarkkaraci mantra (sacred chant), 27, 55, 56–57, 200, 327; sacred ash as, 117; Śiva as, 117. See also pañcākṣara mantra

Mänturai, 162-63

Maraikkātu (Vedāraņyam), 46, 146, 177—78, 215, 298; legend of rat at, 201–2; miracle of temple doors at, 272, 297, 299

Marukal, 151, 215; and Cenkāṭṭaṅkuṭi as brahmin settlements, 147, 191–92; and miracle of the snake-bite cure, 248–50 Mātiniyār, 283

Mayavaram, 59n, 200

Mayilāppūr (Mayilai), 151; festival calendar of Kapālīśvara temple, 186–88; Lalgudi Swaminathan, ōtuvār at Kapālīśvara temple, 61n, 73; legend of Pūmpāvai and Campantar, 186–87n, 271; Pradoṣa Pūjā at Kapālīśvara temple, 56n, 57n; recording of Tēvāram hymns at Kapālīśvara temple, 59n; seashore (neytal) landscape, 147; Vāyilār Nāyapār of, 334

Meru Mountain, 173n, 236 messenger poems, 245n meters, classical Tamil: akaval, 64, 76,

78n; kali, 64, 77n; paripāṭal, 77; veṇpā, 76–77

meters in the Tēvāram hymns: kuruntokai, 82; nēricai, 61; tānṭakam, 61, 72, 80, 82. See also hymn-types in the Tēvāram Meykaṇṭār, 54n, 194 Mīnākṣī. See Goddess Mīyaccūr Iļanköyil, 145, 150

Mullaivāyil (Vaṭatirumullaivāyil), 202, 308–9

Mürkka Näyanär: gambler-saint, 330, 333 Murukan: bbakti god, son of Śiva, 43, 67n, 78n, 167n, 239, 241; Tamil hill god, 4n, 227n

Murukanpūnii, 178–79 musical mode (pan), 20, 23, 40, 59, 61–63, 110n, 141, 176, 233; Cevvali, 172; Kāntāram, 125; Kolli, 61n; Kurinci, 167n, 168; Marul, 120; Naṭṭapāṭai, 62; Nēricai, 139. See also Pāṇar musician; yāļ Mutaliyār caste, 45n Muttāru River, 159, 266n, 267 Mutukuṇru (Mutukuṇram), 159, 183, 266-67; hill landscape, 167-68; legend of cosmic flood, 194-95 muyalakaṇ: demon of ignorance, 98, 131n, 132

Nākaikkāronam, 315-17 Nālatiyār of Patumaņār, 76n Näläyirat tivviyap pirapantam (hymns of the Tamil Vaisnava saints), 4, 10, 53, 227n; commentaries on, 90; recitation of, in temples, 58n. See also Alvars; Tamil Vaisnava sect Nallam, 155-56 Nallāru, 153, 280 Nallūr, 151, 257, 297, 326 Nallürp Perumanam, 21, 281-82 namaḥ śivaya (namaccivāya) mantra. See pañcākşara mantra Naminanti Nayanar, 46, 325, 333 Nammālvār: akam themes in poems of, 39n; Tiruväymoli of, 39n, 212 Nampi Äntar Nampi: author of Tirut tonțar tiruvantăti, 331n; compiler of Tēvāram, 15-16, 273 Nānacampanta Ōtuvār: ōtuvār at Cīrkāli temple, 67, 69, 72, 73n, 74 Nāṇacampantar. See Campantar Nandi: bull of Šiva, 98 Nanipalli, 152-53, 160, 209-10 Nannilam, 196 Nantanār (Nāļaippōvār): untouchable saint, 330, 331n Naraiyūrc Cittīccaram, 104, 183 Nāţţiyattānkuţi, 228-31; Köţpuli Nāyanār of, 228n, 332n nāțu division of Tamil region, 8, 12-13; distribution of Tēvāram hymns in, 146-47; distribution of Tēvāram shrines in, 13 Natunātu, 146

Nāvalūr: birthplace of Cuntarar, 21, 239, 302, 304, 315, 317, 319, 322

Nāyaṇārs (Tamil Śaiva saints): brahmin associations of, 44; defined, 3. See also sixty-three saints

Neṭuṅkalam, 128, 159, 215

neytal (seashore) landscape, 147, 176n, 247n Neyttāṇam, 126, 159, 216 Nīlakkuṭi, 296 Niṇracīr Neṭumāraṇ (Pāṇṭiya king), 273, 332n, 334; as Kūṇpāṇṭiyaṇ, the hunchback king, 272–73 Niṇriyūr, 329

Önakāntangaļi, 233-35
Orriyūr (Tiruvorriyūr), 126, 147, 176, 178, 179, 214, 228, 233n, 234, 251; Cuntarar's marriage to Cankili in, 21, 302, 305-8

ōtuvārs, 23n, 81; history and analysis of Tēvāram performance by, 55-75; in the Tirut tonṭat tokai hymn, 332; training school for, 57, 60

Păccilăcciramam, 229n, 230, 237-39, 271 Pācūr, 152-53, 159n, 160, 214 Pakavatiyār: mother of Campantar, 270 pālai landscape, 160, 176n, 178n Palaiyanur Nīli, 203n. See also Ālankātu Palamannippatikkarai, 258 Palanam, 34, 126, 153, 216 Pallantu hymn, 104, 127 Pallava, 9, 13, 13n, 19, 20, 21, 44, 55n, 144-45, 146, 181, 190-91, 243n, 244; feudatory Naracińka Munaiyaraiyar, 21, 302, 304, 334; Kanchipuram, capital and cultural center, 9, 13, 14n, 144-46; king, and Appar, 292; sculpture, Goddess in, 311n; temples, 144; temple sculpture, Siva in, 96, 99n. See also Ciruttoņţa Nāyaŋār

Pallava kings: Aiyaṭikaļ Kāṭavarkōn, 331—32n, 334; in Cuntarar's Tirut tontat to-kai, 321; and Guptas, 9; Mahendravarman I, 9, 13, 13n, 19, 20, 293; Narasiṃhavarman II, 19

paņ. See musical mode Pāṇar musician, 20, 23; Tirunilakaṇṭayālppāṇar, 20, 336

pañcākṣara mantra (namaḥ śivāya), 27, 205, 216-18, 220-21, 228, 294

Pañcapurāṇam, 60
Paṅkuṇi Uttiram festival: at Mayilai, 186n, 188; at Oṛṇyūr, 178n, 179; at Tīruvārūr, 325

321; queen Mańkaiyarkkaraci, 46-47, 273-77, 332n, 335. See also Campantar; Madurai; Ningacīr Negumāgaņ Parankungam, 43n, 127 Paravai Năcciyâr: wife of Cuntarar, 21, 176, 176n, 302, 305-6, 317; as gift of Siva, 306; philanthropy with Cuntarar, 313; Siva as go-between for Cuntarar and, 305-6, 330-31n; as temple dancer in Tiruvārūr, 305 Pāri (Cankam chieftain and patron), 39n, 317n, 318 Pariyalür Vîrattam, 112-13, 119 Paruppatam (Śriśailam), 114, 158n, 159 Pāśupatas, 17, 17n, 148, 182, 259n Pasupati. See Siva pati: the Lord, 86; sacred place, 87, 145 patikam (hymn): defined, 22; folksong and, 77; kaţţaļai rule and, 79; and pattu (decad), 22; and pattu (song), 77; as verse and poem, 80. See also Tēvāram hymns Pātirippuliyūr, 214, 222 Pattinattär, 194n peasants in the Tamil region: alliance of, with brahmins, 10, 44; status, in relation to brahmins, 44n, 45n; transplanting rice, 164. See also Vellala Pennai River, 21, 303 Periya purāņam (Tamil Šaiva hagiography), 14n, 18, 19, 47, 47n, 48-49, 52n, 60, 64n, 144n, 191n, 269-70, 273, 281n, 284, 302, 330; lives of the sixtythree saints in, 321; Tamil community in, 321 Pērūr, 160, 244 phalasruti. See signature verse; Tēvāram hymns: benefits of singing Pillai caste, 45n, 60n Pine Forest sages: and Siva, 96-99 Pirapantam genre, 77n Ponni, See Kaveri River Potivil Mountain, 216 pantarankam dance, 99, 245n, 246. See

Pantiya (Pandyan), 145, 272; kingdom

(Pāṇṭiyanāṭu), 8n, 13, 43n, 146; king of Maturai, 272–73, 276–77, 280–81; kings, 8, 20, 181; minister Kulaccirai

Nayanar, 46, 273-76, 331n, 333; monarchs in the Tirut tontat tokai hymn,

also dance of Siva

Päntikkotumuti, 220-21

Pradoșa Püjă ceremony, 56n, 57n pūjā ritual, 43, 45, 55, 61, 66-67, 73, 182n, 211n. See also ritual worship Pukalanär: father of Appar, 283 Pukalttunai Navanar of Puttur, 325-26. Pukalūr, 112, 215, 253-54, 317-19 Pukkoliyür Avināci, 312 pulaiyan (an untouchable caste), 45, 264; as a saint Nantanar, 47, 330, 331n Pulamańkai, 110 Pullirukkuvēļūr (Vaittīšvaran Kōyil), 59, 198n, 200 Pūmpāvai: young woman of Mylapore, 186-89, 271 Punkür, 330 puram poetry, 33, 34 Puranānūru, 293n, 317n Puranas, 40, 64, 67, 101, 199n Purușasūkta, 115n Pütam (Pütattālvār), 227n Püvanam, 181

rāga scale-type: in Carnatic music, 59, 61—62; comparison of expository style in Carnatic and Tēvāram traditions, 63—65; in Tēvāram performance, 61
Rāma (hero of Rāmāyaṇa), 286n; builder of temple at Irāmēccuram, 199—200. See also Viṣṇu
Rāmānuja, 52n, 57
Rāmāyaṇa, 73, 87n, 130n, 198, 286n; of Kampan (Irāmāvataram), 64n
Rameswaram. See Irāmēccuram
Rāvaṇa, 198; and Appar, 130n; as brahmin, 198n. See also Śaiva myth: Rāvaṇa and Kailāsa ritual worship in Tamil Śaivism, 11, 18, 226–27; conception of, in the Tēvāram, 42–44; connection with emotional devotion, 43–47; by devotees, 42–47, 148, 180–81, 199, 242; with five products of the cow (āṇaintu), 69–72, 112, 208, 218, 230, 233, 260, 327; offered to linga, 101, 182n, 197, 208, 210. See also temples of Śiva: ritual worship Rudra: Vedic prototype of Śiva, 26, 29n, Rudra: Vedic prototype of Siva, 26, 29n, 95, 113, 115n. See also Śatarudrīya sacred ash: emblem of Śiva, 221, 234, 274–77

sacred places: alliteration of Śiva's names with, 146; as arenas of devotion, 148; as beloved abodes of Śiva, 143, 148; cult of, in Tamil Śaivism, 13–14; distribution of hymns dedicated to, 146–47; eight Vīraṭṭāṇam shrines (Aṭṭavīraṭṭāṇam), 35, 100; landscapes and, 147; and local legends, 145, 193–203, 246n; pilgrimages of Tēvāram poets and, 12–13, 145–46; as places of pilgrimage (pati), 12, 145, 148; in the Tēvāram, 143, 145–46, 147, 159–61

Saiva myth: Andhaka, destruction of, 132; Arjuna, penance of, 35, 129, 137, 139, 254-55, 288; Bhagiratha, austerities of, 35, 137, 174; Brahmā, decapitation of, 131, 202n, 292; Dakşa, destruction of sacrifice of, 81n, 132, 135-36, 141, 154-55, 222; Gajāsura, flaying of, 97n, 99n, 137, 140, 174, 320; Kāma, burning of, 35, 97n, 131, 135, 138n, 140, 149, 162, 226, 239, 260, 292, 294, 310; Markandeya, rescue of, from Death, 96, 128-29, 134, 138-39, 147, 149, 172, 196-97, 222, 230, 244, 292; Rāvaņa and Kailāsa, 22, 122, 129-31, 136, 138, 141, 165, 167, 168n, 170, 175, 194, 220-21, 240, 243, 249, 275, 292, 316; three cities of demons, destruction of, 34-35, 68, 99n, 116-17, 122, 128, 154, 169, 173, 181, 255, 288, 292, 303, 304; Visnu, gift of wheel and destruction of Jalandhara, 194, 200-201

Saiva Siddhānta, 12, 18; conception of yogic vision of Śiva, 227n; fourfold classification of religious activity in, 45-46; lineage of teachers (cantāṇācāriyārkaļ), 17; literature, 17; philosophy, characterized, 17-18; Sanskrit texts in, 53n; sixfold classifications in, 133n; teachers and fundamental Tamil treatises, 52-53; theologians, caste background of, 54; ultimate categories in, 17, 206; Vedas and Āgamas in, 53; view of creation, 133n. See also Āgama; cariyai; kiriyai; Śaiva Siddhānta theology

Saiva Siddhānta theology: compared to Tēvāram theology, 206; the Lord's grace (arul) in, 18; relationship between soul and Lord in, 86, 206; of release from bolism of dance of Śiva in, 99 Śańkarācārya (Śańkara), 52n, 55 Sanskrit court poetry (kāvya), 27–29, 31; citrakāvya, 82n; classical Tamil meters karmic bondage in, 17-18, 205-6; sym-citrakāvya, 82n; classical Tamil meters and, 76-77; figures of speech in, 28-29; lyric stanzas in, 64-66; stanzaic form, 76; Subhāṣitaratnakoṣa anthology, 27n, 31n, 101n. See also Kālidāsa

Sanskrit language, 4n, 5, 9, 9n, 10, 40; and Sanskritization, 5n, 8n; and Tamil, 56, 69-71. See also brahmins; mantra; Śiva; stotra; Vedas

Śatarudrīya, 26-27, 26n, 27n, 56, 57n, 95, 113n, 115n, 217 service: in the Tamil Śaiva bhakti cult, 20, 41-42, 44-47 shrine. See temple signature verse (phalasruti, tirukkațaik-kāppu), 22, 73, 206

Siva: abode of all blessings, 69, 109, 322; Ardhanārīśvara, 97, 105, 109, 233n, 257n; auspicious Lord, 95; best patron for poets, 317-19; Bhikṣāṭana, 99, 123-26; as brahmins and Veda, 81, 102, 109-10, 112, 218; chanter of Veda, 121, 153, 155, 183, 259, 307; Cokkanätha of Maturai, 276, 278; confrontation of, with Pine forest sages, 97-99; Cuntarar's royal patron, 313; Dakşināmūrti, 96n, 128n, 129, 139n, 140, 167; as devotee's eye, 32n, 115-17, 205; devotee's Father, 115-17, 161, 185, 213-14, 216, 226, 231-32, 237, 251, 267, 274, 316; devotee's kinsman, 36, 104, 184-85, 205, 213-14, 237, 251, 307; eight attributes (enkunam) of, 293n, 296, 327n; eight flowers of, 97n; emblems of, 205, 216-21; feet of, 98, 120, 195, 205, 209, 218, 222-23, 256, 259, 266, 297; fivefold cosmic activity of, 99-100; as, or as giver of, unattainable treasure, 108, 154-55, 200; go-between for Cuntarar and Paravai, 305-6, 330-31n; god with eight forms (astāmūrti), 95, 113, 241, 295, 307; handsome youth, 176-78; iconography of, in pan-Indian tradition, 96; iconography of, in Tevaram, 95-100; Kālasamhāramūrti, 96; Kampan or Ēkampan in Kanchipuram, 201, 201n, 228, 240; Kankāla, 131; madman (pittan),

Siva (cont.)

180, 257, 299, 303; Mahādeva, 26, 95, 263n, 264, 294; Master, 172, 180, 237–39, 242, 244, 274, 284, 309, 310, 312; Naṭarāja, Lord of the Dance, 99–100, 118–22; Paśupati, Lord of Beasts and Souls, 98, 222, 242, 308–9; as physician, 200; player of the lute (vīṇā), 40, 104–5, 104–5n, 109, 124, 315; in Sanskrit court poetry, 27–29, 101; seducer of wives of Pine Forest sages, 124n; seducer of women, 124–25, 315; as Tamil and Sanskrit, 40, 69–72, 112; Tamil king, 33, 34, 35, 41, 143, 147; Vaṇmīkanātar in Tiruvārūr, 287n, 288; yogi, 96. See also Rudra; Satarudrīya

Śivañānacittiyār, 45n

Šiva temple festivals, 66, 181–89; Aţtami, 182, 188; Kārttikai, 187, 205n; Golden swing, 189; Mahāśivarātri, 184n; Ōnam (Tiruvōṇam), 187; Peruñcānti (Great Purification), 186, 189; Taippūcam (Pūcam) festival, 123n, 124, 182, 183, 183n, 188; Vacantōrcavam (Spring festival) in Tiruvārūr, 305. See also Paṅkuṇi Uttiram festival; Tiruvātirai festival six religious or philosophical traditions (arucamayam), 133, 132-33n

sixty-three Nāyaṇār saints: activities of, 44-47; Arupattumūvar, 47; diverse background of, 47, 321; festival of, at Kapālīšvara temple, 186n; lives of, in Periya purāṇam, 17, 19; in Tirut toṇṭat tokai, 14, 321, 331-36; as warriors, 321 śloka, 66

smṛti: traditional texts, 52, 57–59 song-types, classical Tamil: vaṇṇam, 124, 212n, 213; vāram, 22; Vari, 77, 212n. See also Cilappatikāram

Sri Lanka (Lankā): in the Rāmāyaṇa, 198– 99, 249, 316; Tēvāram sites in, 146

Śrīśailam. See Paruppatam

Sruti: revealed literature, 4n, 40, 52, 56, 58, 59

stotra; Sanskrit hymns, 25, 26, 27, 55, 58-59, 66, 85, 217n

tāla, 20, 61, 62, 63, 65. See also Carnatic music

Tamil Icaic Cankam: Tamil music movement and, 60n; Tirumurai concert at, 73 Tamil kingdoms (three): in Cankam age, 8; in Cilappatikāram, 10. See also Cēra; Cōla; Pāntiya

Tamil language, 3, 3n, 9, 40, 41; ambiguity in syntax of, 90; classification of literature in, 77n; love of, 50; "pure" variety of, 83, 189, 236, 329; Sanskrit and, 56, 69–71, 112; Śiva and, 56, 112; Tēvāram and modern, 83, 90

Tamil months: Aippaci, 186n; Cittirai, 186n; Kārttikai, 186n, 205n; Māci, 186n; Mārkaļi, 186n; Pankuṇi, 186n; Tai, 186n; Vaikāci, 281n. See also Šiva temple festivals

Tamilnadu, 3, 44n, 200n; Cankam literature in contemporary, 82; Madras state renamed as, 41n; nāţu divisions in, 12–13; Terukkūttu street drama of, 64

Tamil Śaiva sect, 3; caste orientation of, 53-54; development of, 17-18, 53-54; four saints as camayakurus (Preceptors) of, 15, 48; institutional centers (maṭam, ātīṇam), 17, 54, 54n, 60; Tēvāram as scripture of, 5, 15, 52-59; Tēvāram authors, principal leaders of, 3, 15

Tamil Vaiṣṇava sect (Śrīvaiṣṇava sect), 3— 4; Ācārya Nāthamuni, and recovery of Āļvār hymns, 16n; Ācārya teachers of, and the ubhayavedānta philosophy, 53— 54, 57—58, 58n; sacred geography in, 13n; and Tamil Śaivism, 6n; temple in, 11, 11n. See also Āļvārs; Nālāyirat tivviyap pirapantam

Tantiyatikal Nāyanār: blind man blessed with vision, 331n, 335; and Jains, 329 tantra, 200; sacred ash as, 277. See also Āgama: mantra

Tantras, 11

Tarumapuram Ātīṇam, 54n, 57n, 60n, 87n, 198n; edition of Tēvāram published by, 88

temple, 14–16, 18, 20, 23, 256; as abode of king, 34; architecture of, in South India, 144–45; as beloved abode of Śiva, 143; body as, 211n, 212; cosmic symbolism of, 145, 195; and cult of king, 33–34, 143; devotee's heart as, 181; discovery of Tēvāram hymns in, 16; evocation of, in Tēvāram hymns, 148–57; importance of, in Tamil Śaiva religion, 11; mountain, river, and, 158; as place of pilgrimage, 158; as sacred center, 143, 149, 195n. See also ōtuvārs; ritual worship; temples of Śiva; Tēvāram hymns temples of Siva: and cult of sacred places, 12–13; and cult of saints and Cola, 14–15; iconography in, 52, 55; and impact of Tēvāram on Tamil, 14; performance of Tēvāram hymns in, 23; pilgrimages of Tēvāram authors and, 20–21, 146–47; ritual worship in, 24, 26–27, 33, 44, 45, 55, 60, 73, 148, 256

Terukkūttu theater, 64-65

Tēvāram hymns: akam landscapes in, 36-39, 72, 147-48; akam themes in, 207, 244-50; alliteration and audiovisual patterns in, 78-82; arrangement according to pan scale-types, 23, 62; ascetic themes in, 207, 251-54; authors and date, 3, 19; autobiographical references in, 147; benefits of singing, 22, 73, 86-87, 141, 150, 156, 160, 176, 189, 196, 235, 243, 266-67, 276-80, 304, 312, 315, 317, 319, 324; commentaries on, lack of, 88, 90; compilation and canonization of, 12-16; continuing importance of, in Tamil culture, 5-6; early documents and expressions of bhakti and Tamil religion, 4-5; editions and anthologies, 87-88; formation of new meters in, 78-79; four central myths in, 100; Goddess in, 101; as great religious poetry, 91; importance given to ritual worship and Agamas in, 11-12, 208; karma and release in, 106; language of, 83-85, 90; and later bhakti poetry, 6; as mantras, 56-57; meters in, 64-65; name, 21-22; as offering to God, 24, 212, 265; oral traditional features in, 84, 91; performance of, in temples, 23, 23n, 55; refrains in, 81; rhetoric of, 24, 24n, 207; "song of the place," 51; structural contrast of, with Cankam poems, 78-79; synthesis of Sanskritic and Tamil values in, 5; Tamil Śaiva community in, 24; as Tamil songs, 40, 265, 279, 304; as Tamil Veda, 52-59, 73, 91, 269; Tāņtakam genre in, 32n, 49; and traditions of praise, 24; treatment of Siva's myths in, 100; unification of classical categories in, 49. See also patikam; Tirumurai Thanjavur (Tanjore): Brihadīśvara temple in, 144n, 320n; district, 22n, 39n, 55n, 151n; town of, 59n, 144

Tilakavatiyār: sister of Appar, 29, 283
Tillai. See Chidambaram
Tinkaļūr, 297
Tiruccirāppaļļi. See Cirāppaļļi
Tirukkaļirruppāṭiyār of Uyyavantatēvar, 227n tirukkaṭaikkāppu. See signature verse; Tēvāram hymns; benefits of singing Tirukköṇamalai, 146, 159

Tirukkuraļ of Tiruvaļļuvar, 76, 80n
Tirumankai Āļvār, 196n
Tirumantiram of Tirumūlar, 16, 99–100, 211n, 227n, 331n

Tirumūla Nāyaṇār, 331n, 333. See also Tirumantiram of Tirumūlar

Tirumurai, 15n; formation of, 15-17; hymns of the eleventh, 194n; interpretation of, by ōtuvārs, 73; name "Tēvāram" for first seven books of, 21; performance of, by ōtuvārs, 51, 55, 59-60; as synthetic sacred literature, 58-59; Tāṇṭakam hymns in sixth, 26; as Veda (marai), 56-58. See also Tēvāram hymns Tirumuraikanṭa purānam, 15-16, 16n,

61n, 62, 63n
Tirumurukārruppaṭai, 43n
Tirunīlakanṭayālppāṇa Nāyaṇār: accompanist for Campantar, 20; Pāṇar musician,

336
Tiruppācuram hymn of Campantar, 281
Tiruppallāṇṭu, 60
Tiruppaṇantāļ Ātīṇam, 54n
Tiruppukaļ of Aruṇakirinātar, 67n, 78n

Tirut tontar purānam. See Periya purānam Tirut tontat tokai hymn: "List of the Holy Devotees," 14, 44n, 269, 321, 331–36

Tiruvācakam, 18, 21n, 55, 58, 66, 67n, 91, 113n, 269
Tiruvāmūr: birthplace of Appar, 19, 283

Tiruvāmūr: birthplace of Appar, 19, 283 Tiruvānmiyūr, 59n, 107–8; Marundeeswarar temple, 59n

Tiruvārūr (Ārūr), 13, 14, 21, 46, 50, 59-60, 56n, 114-15, 119, 127, 131, 144-45, 147, 149-50, 159-60, 178, 182, 184-86, 214, 225-26, 228, 233n, 235, 239, 244-45, 252-54, 256-57, 265, 289-92, 297-302, 305-6, 311-12, 313, 315n, 316, 325; Cola cultural center,

Tiruvārūr (Arūr) (cont.) 145-46; Mülaţţāṇam, 144n, 253, 287-89, 311n, 312; Tyāgarāja temple, 144n Tiruvarutpā of Irāmalinka Aţikal, 205n Tiruvătirai festival (Arudră Darsana), 117; at Tiruvānmiyūr, 56n; at Tiruvārūr, 115n, 184-87 Tiruvāvatuturai Ātīņam, 54n Tiruväymoli of Nammälvär, 212n Tiruvicaippā, 60 Tiruvilaiyātar purāņam, 273 Tiruvițaivây temple: hymn discovered at, 22n Tiruvorriyür. See Orriyür Tontaiman, 202 Tünkänaimätam, 145, 156-57, 221, 296 Turutti, 126, 216 Tyagaraja: Carnatic composer, 74

ubhayavedānta, See Tamil Vaisņava sect Umāpati Civācāriyār, 54n, 86; Tiruvaruṭpayaṇ of, 227 Umāpaticivam tēvāra arulmuṭait tiraṭṭu, 86 Upaniṣads, 52, 95, 95n, 206n Uṛaiyūr, 215

Vaikāvūr, 265 Vaikuntha: abode of Vișnu, 206n Vaittisvaran Köyil. See Pullirukkuvelür Valampuram, 152-53 Valañculi, 123-24, 147, 215, 263, 265-66 Vāli, 286 Valivalam, 251-324 Válkoliputtűr, 123 Varuna: god of the ocean, 320n Vațatirumullaivăyil. See Mullaivâyil Vatukar tribes, 178n, 179 Väymür, 160, 214, 297-99 Vedäranyam. See Maraikkätu Vedas, 4n, 8, 25, 26, 40, 44, 69-71, 102, 110, 119, 122, 129, 132, 200n, 232, 272, 322; hymns, 25, 119, 222, 227, 261; pañcākṣara as essence of, 217; recitation of, and Tamil hymns, 52-59; as śruti, 40, 56. See also brahmins; śruti

Vēlāyuta Mutaliyār, 57n
Vellala caste: and affiliation of Tamil Śaiva sectarian leaders, 17; and background of Appar, 19–20; and background of Cankili, wife of Cuntarar, 21, 305; and brahmins, 44, 45n, 53n, 54–55; and ōtuvārs, 60n

Vēnkatam hill, 8 Venkāţu (Tiruvenkāţu), 193–94; Mukkuļam pond at, 193

Venneynallür, 21, 147, 243n; Aruţturai shrine in, 303; Cuntarar's conversion at, 302-4, 309

Venniyūr, 210, 263, 267 Venpākkam, 305, 309-10 versification, elements of, in Tamil: acai, 77-79; ati, 77; cantam, 78n, 79n; cīr, 78-79; etukai, 80, 84; mōṇai, 80; nēr, 77, 79n; nirai, 78, 79 Vēṭkaļam, 118

Vilimilalai (Tiruvilimilalai), 48–49, 128–29, 146–47, 181, 190, 193n, 194, 216, 257–58; gift of gold coins to saints at, 271–72, 297–99, 315n, 316, 324 vimāna, 139n, 144–45, 246n. See also temple: architecture of

Virati ascetics (Mahāvratins), 42, 184 viruttam: as interpretive performance style, 72–75, 81; meter, 61, 64–65; singing style, 61–67

Viruttam: a supplementary meter, 64
Viṣṇu (Māl, Tirumāl), 4n, 24, 25n, 27, 32, 39, 43, 83; adorned by basil, 162n, 195; child who ate earth, 232; god with the wheel, 300; Krishna, 39, 232n; lying on ocean and on serpent, 192, 194; Māyōṇ, 24, 25n; mountain-lifter, 195; Narasiṃha, slayer of Hiraṇyakaśipu, 127, 257; as Rama, 199–200; the Strider, 110, 122, 127, 129, 152, 178; worshipper of Śiva, 133n, 135, 194, 200–201, 300

vṛtta: Sanskrit meter, 54-65

Yakşagāna theater, 64 yāl, 23, 23n, 61n, 163, 171, 233n

